CHAPTER VIII. MAKING THINGS PLEASANT.

To a man who, all his lifetime, had been accustomed to have his own way, the feeling that someone holds the whip-hand over him is not a pleasant one; especially when he is urged to go along a road which he strongly objects to. It was a new sensation for Philip Bourchier to find he had a master, and he cast about in every direction to try and shake off the galling yoke. Until he had settled how to proceed he vouchsafed no information to his family as to the object of the young man's visit. His daughters' curiosity he defied with the explanation "important private business." His wife he silenced by begging her to say nothing about it until to-morrow, when he would know more concerning the matter. All the evening and the greater part of the night he devised plans to get rid of the intruder, or baited golden hooks which he hoped he could not resist. He thought about it over his breakfast; he strolled through the grounds all the morning thinking about it, but could see no way out of the difficulty. He had now only a few hours to decide, and he knew if he did not decide as the self-styled Digby Bourchier wished, it would be war to the knife between them. He thought of the fellow's last words, and could not help believing he would go to any extremity. If the pretender laid claim to Redhills, he could with the evidence he possessed prove that he, Philip Bourchier, had taken the life of John Boucher. In spite of all verdicts which had justified his act, what would the world think? If this Digby Bourchier did not feel confident enough to carry his case into court, and simply spread the tale about as he threatened to do, how could he stop him? If he indicted him for libel, he would plead justification—and then—Mr. Bourchier shuddered at the thought. At any price, the man must be silenced.

Then he began to stoop and made the first signs of submission. He wrote a note asking his antagonist to call on him at once; or if he preferred it, he would come to the inn and see him. As he put the note in the envelope, a fresh difficulty presented itself; he could not bring himself to address it to Mr. Digby Bourchier; yet he knew him by no other name. However, he left the envelope blank, telling his messenger to take it to the inn for the gentleman who was staying there, and wait for an answer. The answer came Philip Bourchier stamp with rage. It ran so: "Mr. Bourchier presents his compliments to Mr. Philip Bourchier, and begs to say he will call at the hour he fixed yesterday, and will then learn Mr. Philip Bourchier's decision in the manner Mr. Bourchier specified."

This impudent assumption of the title Mr. Bourchier, and the designation of himself as Mr. Philip Bourchier was a supplementary declaration of war. Philip Bourchier knew that unless prepared to fight he must grant the pretender his own terms. He went into the house and found his wife. "Adelaide," he said, "I want to talk to you."

Mrs. Bourchier laid down the book she was reading and waited his pleasure. "I told you who that young man was who called yesterday and the day before?" "Yes, Philip. There is nothing to trouble about, I hope."

"I don't know, but I fear so. There is no doubt that the entry of the marriage has been found. Indeed, I have seen the certificate."

"Philip! What does it mean?" "I hardly know yet," said Mr. Bourchier, savagely. "But if what he says is true, it may mean Redhills."

His wife looked at him with a terrified face. "It seems impossible," she said, "after so many years."

"That—old man kept the claim open with his lawsuits, or it would be impossible."

of the American about him—I noticed that."

"Do you really think he could turn us out?" "As sure as he is the grandson of that old fellow he can. The last time I spoke about the case to Clarkson he laughed, and asked if I had heard anything more of the bastard branch. Then I asked him a plain question, 'If that marriage could be proved, what then?' He said, 'As there's no human possibility of proving what never happened, I don't mind telling you, as a lawyer, that the title to Redhills is dependent on that marriage or non-marriage.'"

Mrs. Bourchier's tears were flowing. "Oh, it is shameful!" she said. "To think we may be beggars at any moment! Oh, Philip, what shall we do?"

"I can suggest nothing, except meeting him as he wishes, and by-and-by trying to make a compromise."

"Oh, do," she cried. "Do anything you can. Ask him here, if you think it best to do so."

"I do think it best, Adelaide."

"I promised to give him my answer to-day. We are alone to-night, he had better dine with us. I will send over and ask him."

Philip Bourchier had never found words so difficult to utter as these. Even the crime that weighed upon him seemed little compared with the self-degradation of that speech. Even his wife was surprised at his haste to welcome this young man who made such a change in every prospect of his life.

"Do as you think fit," she said. "I will meet him bravely, and play my part as well as I can."

Her husband kissed her kindly, and went to the library to write the note which signified capitulation. But, in yielding, he had no intention of being at his mercy all his lifetime. He laid down a line of action. He would receive him, acknowledge him as his cousin, conceal the distaste he felt to his society—would even consent to the world looking upon them as friends—he would supply him with money for a while; then, if he could get from him the name of that mysterious witness, and arrange matters with the latter—shipping him off to the antipodes, or otherwise providing for him—Mr. Bourchier could turn on his taskmaster, defy him, and kick him out, bidding him do his worst. His story would only be regarded as a malicious act of revenge—the invention of an unmasked impostor. Necessity brings strange bed-fellows, who can be kicked out when necessity ceases. The more he thought of it, the more feasible the scheme seemed; he had but to be patient and wait. This man, Digby Bourchier, or whoever he may be, by his extraordinary determination to live as a friend within his enemy's gates was sealing his own doom.

"Had he really been Digby Bourchier, he might have done it," he said, grimly, as he despatched his note. "Not being Digby Bourchier, it is but the act of a fool."

This second note was properly addressed to Digby Bourchier, Esq., and the joy of the recipient knew no bounds; he felt he had triumphed all along the line. Had it not been for the ordeal that awaited him in the evening, he would have celebrated his victory in many brandies-and-water; but on the threshold of his entrance to a higher life, he saw it behooved him to be careful—he had a wary and unscrupulous foe to deal with. If he neglected caution, victory to-day might be defeat to-morrow. When the appointed time drew near, he dressed himself properly; he had evening clothes with him, and blessed his foresight at such being the case. Then he walked quietly up to the great house. His confidence in his own powers greatly increased; the difficult part of the play was over, the rest was nothing to a clever man. As he reached the lodge-gate he turned round, and, fearing no observation, as it
