CHAPTER XVIII.
FACE TO FACE.

Although he did not at once realize the fact, it was broad daylight when Digby Bourchier's senses began to return to him. When he dimly comprehended the position in which he was lying—his head resting against the leg of an arm-chair, and his feet somewhere in the region of the fender—and found that it behooved him to get out of it as soon as possible, his idea was that it was still night. The shutters and the door were closed, the gas alight. The servants had looked into the room, and seeing the state of affairs had left their master to make the best of them. It was about ten in the morning when he rose from the hearth, and with some difficulty, and wondering the while if such spitting and splashing had not been the result of his head striking the fender, he coughed and slept again. At present he was not equal to the exertion of recalling the events which had placed him in so uncomfortable a state. He had been drunk—very drunk; no effort of mind was needed to arrive at that conclusion; so he trembled no more about the matter, but slept on for two or three hours longer. Then he awoke, sober, but very ill.

He lay blinking and thinking; by and by matters began to arrange themselves in his racking brain. He remembered coming home with Bates—remembered that Josephine was in the room when they entered it. Then he remembered Josephine with a dagger in her hand, and sitting opposite to him with one arm bare; that he remembered her had been angry; that he struck her in his anger.

"I must have been awfully gone," he said, "or she must have been uncommonly provoking. It doesn't matter which."

His watch told him, but the clock on the wall-piece told him the time. He was surprised to find it so late, and being troubled by no sense of shame, rang the bell for the servant.

"Open the shutters," he said; "clear the place up and get me some tea."

He went to his room, plunged his head in cold water, and presently came down to his tea feeling a trifle better.

"Where's your mistress?" he asked the servant maid.

"I don't know, please, sir."

"Don't know! Has she gone out?"

"If you please, sir," said the servant mysteriously, "I think missus has gone away, sir."

"What do you mean? Where has she gone to?"

"She came to our room last night, sir, and showed me and cook her poor arm. We haven't seen her since."

"Isn't she in her bedroom—go and see."

"No, sir; the door was open this morning, and the bed hadn't been lain upon. She's gone away, and I don't wonder at it. And, if you please, me and cook would like to go as soon as convenient."

"Go and be d—!" said Digby, politely.

He was not much surprised to find that his wife had left him. He asserted himself of the fact by a visit to her room. She had simply gone, leaving no letter or trace behind her. He cared little for her flight, thinking that the time had come when he could do without her. As for the safety of the woman who had left his roof at three o'clock in the morning, there was, he felt, no need to trouble. As a natural course she would go straight to Redhill, where she was welcome to stay until he wanted her. He could claim her when he chose, and she would give him another hold on her father.

Several days elapsed before he discovered that Josephine had not gone empty-handed. Having had no occasion to go to his safe for money, the absence of an important item of its contents was not revealed. He had slept at home each night, and had paid no visits to that cottage a few miles out of town. The reason of this omission was that the fair occupant whose mode of life was such a subject of interest to the quiet village had suddenly quitted it. No doubt she had had the Arcadian life dull, and at the instance of another admirer had left to better her condition. Her successor not yet being installed, the cottage was empty for a time.

About a week after Josephine's flight Digby was waited upon by his servant. They asked him if he expected Mrs. Bourchier would return, and upon hearing his surly negative informed him that, having as good as taken other places, they intended leaving his service that day. Their going or staying being a matter of perfect indifference to him, he contented himself with his former polite remark; and in reply to their request for wages due, told them to get them where they could. The domestics left in a tantrum, threatening to see him for the amount; and he was quite alone in his house.

This being such an uncomfortable state of things, he soon followed his servants' example, and, picking up what he wanted, purposed to take up his abode for a while at an hotel. The last thing he did before he quitted the house was to take his money from the safe. He counted it and found it right; then he looked for the pocket book full of papers which were too valuable and important to leave behind him. The pocket-book was gone. He turned all the papers in the chest upon the floor, and found it was undoubtedly missing. It was a long time before he could believe it; now did he question his hope until he had searched every pocket of every article of clothing he owned, wondering if he could have left it in either. No; he could distinctly remember that the last time he went to the safe the book was there. He remembered seeing and handling it. It was gone—stolen, and stolen for a purpose.

He sat down and used a great deal of vigorous language. There was no one to hear him, so he could indulge without the slightest restraint. He directed many of his remarks to himself, but many more to his absent wife; but not for a moment did he doubt who had robbed him. So far as he knew the key had never been out of his possession—so far as he knew, for he thought of those hours when he lay insensible to touch and deaf to all sounds—dead drunk. That night Josephine had left him, but before leaving had taken the key and had ransacked his private safe. It could be no one else. Another would have taken the money, and left the document. The act was Josephine's, but the instigation Mr. Bourchier's. That was why she had lived so long with him after domestic comfort became a mockery—it was simply to wait for this opportunity, which at last his own folly had made for her. The thing was clear as daylight. He threw the worthless papers back into the box, locked it, and went downstairs to think—with the assistance of brandy and water—to what extent this unexpected loss jeopardized his interest.

He took it for granted that the papers had been straightway taken to Mr. Bourchier; that they were, unless destroyed, at this moment in his hands. To make the case worse, every paper was there—even the one which certified his own death and his pretended sister's birth. This, so far as Mr. Bourchier was concerned, would afford him but little; there was nothing more for that gentleman to learn. He was thinking of the time when he might be compelled by circumstances to tell the tale to Allan or Frances, as it best suited his purpose. He argued that the possession and production of those documents would stamp his assertions with truth; in their absence his tale would be disregarded and laughed at. Even Frances, eager as he guessed her to be to hear what he knew about her father's death, would perhaps disbelieve the statement of a self-invited impostor. If she loved her husband she would be all the more ready to think his accusation a false one. After all, he had nothing to prove his words, except the personal matters which had belonged to John Bourchier, and which he had extorted from Mr. Stokes. That gentleman had also vanished from sight for a long time.

He might obtain copies of the stolen certificates, but doing so would take some time; and as to places, names, and dates, of one or two he was uncertain. No; he could not afford the delay. He must find Josephine at once; and if by any happy chance she still kept possession of the documents, must, by threats, cajolery, or force, get them from her, or, at least, learn why she took them, and to whom she had given them.

He went straightway to Redhill, and, forcing his way into Mr. Bourchier's presence, demanded that his wife should be restored to him. He was incredulous when over and over again he was assured she had not sought asylum beneath her father's roof. He talked loudly about property having been taken, and threatened some nonsense about search warrants.

"Search and welcome," said Mr. Bourchier; "she is not here—she has not been here. If she had been in the house you may be sure you would not have been allowed to enter. You presume here should convince you, even if you doubt my word."

"You have heard from her."

"I received a letter from the lady in whose care she now is, saying Josephine had left you never to return. I know no more."

"You know where she is; is she at Shortlands?"

"I must decline to answer you," said Mr. Bourchier, firmly.

"I shall go and see for myself."

The speaker was uncertain whether the papers had reached Redhill after all. In that case he fancied Mr. Bourchier would have taken a higher hand than he had done during the interview.

"Go—anyway, Josephine shall never return to you."

"I'll see about that too."

Mr. Bourchier gave a kind of weary sigh. He was looking very ill.

"Look here," he said, "before you go tell me if there is anything you hold sacred—any way of pledging yourself and keeping your word."

"I always keep my word—you ought to know that."

"Is there any way I can bind you—any way I can make you harmless? Tell me for what sun you will leave England, and before going will give me all those papers you showed me, and everything else you hold."

"You're beginning to get reasonable," said Digby, delighted to find that the papers had not yet reached Mr. Bourchier.

"I am beginning to die," said he, with an emphasis which made the villain start. "You will die some day and learn what it means. Look in my face and read your work there."

"Well, part of it was your own act," said Digby, with an uneasy laugh.

"You fool!" said Mr. Bourchier. "If I regret my act, as you call it, a man of your type should know it is not that which is killing me. Rogue, villain, blood-sucker as you are, you must have some feelings of compassion. Hand me over those papers, leave England, and show me some way which will insure your silence, and I will pay a handsome price."

Mr. Bourchier had never spoken before in this strain. Digby was mentally calculating how to act best for his own interests. He quite believed his companion had not long to live; still, the decision was too weighty a one to be given off-hand.

"I told you once," said Mr. Bourchier, "you had been too clever. Take my advice and don't make that mistake again. I may repent; send for Allan, his wife, and a clergyman—people often feel like that before they die."

He spoke in a satirical, half-mocking way. The threat was a strange, a horrible one, but Digby knew it was meant in grim earnest, and hearing it, realized that after all Philip Bourchier was a man of stronger will than himself. He knew with death drawing near him he could not have talked in that way.
