'Yes, a very old friend.' He asked the question as if so much depended upon it that she could not help blushing as she answered it. Was the blush for him or for Manders? Allan would have felt much more comfortable had he known.

'I will 'ask about, as they say in the West, and let you know,' he said, bidding her

'Good morning, Mr. Bourchier,' said Mrs. Melville. 'I am glad to have seen you. I knew your father. I danced with him years ago at a county ball, and met him several times afterwards at a friend's. I wonder if he has changed as much as I have?' 'He has changed a great deal,' said Allan rather sadly. 'Sometimes I fear he is break. ing up altogether.'

He was glad to find that Mrs. Melville knew his father. He fancied she was nearly related to Frances, and it was pleasant to find that the girl's connections were of his own station in life. Not that it made any difference to him; but by and by, if things were right, he would have to tell his father and mother of the happiness he had won.

'I like that young man,' said Mrs. Melville, after his departure. 'He means well, my dear. He is good and honest, and by no means a fool. He is the eldest son, and Redhills is a fine property.'

'So much the better for him,' said Frances. 'Yes. There is no position so pleasant as a country gentleman's. His father was member for the country; very likely it will be his turn some day,'

Frances said nothing. 'Philip Bourchier was a handsome young man-not so handsome as his son, though He was not much liked then; he was proud, and people whispered funny tales about him. Then he reformed and settled down. There was a lawsuit about the estate some long time ago.'

'Did that make him settle down?' 'I don't know,' said Mrs. Melville, not noticing the absurdity of the question. 'Perhaps it did. Lawsuits are great trials-all my husband's money went in one.'

Mrs. Melville, during Allan's visit, had seen what Frances had not seen, or pretended she had not seen. There were little signs, tokens, ways of speech which revealed much of the game to an experienced looker-on. With the keen interest she felt in the girl, nothing would have pleased Mrs. Melville more than to have seen her married to a suitable person, and Allan seemed to fulfil every requirement. With her strange ideas of the stage, it never entered into her head to doubt that Frances, even at the outset of her promising career, would, without hesitation, resign all the honors which she might expect were waiting for her, in order to become the wife of a gentleman who would hold such a good position in the county of Westshire as Allan when he became Bourchier of Redhills. The opposition she feared, would come from his family. Naturally, side, looking for and reading the future i they would object to his taking an actress for his wife, though she could not thinking, part, in spite of her prejudices and the exalted value she placed upon county aristocracy, that Frances would be an acquisition to any family she entered. So the kindly old match-maker hoped the young fellow would call again, and trusted that in time her charge would feel as much moved by the modern love songs as she had been by the plated old ones in the days of her first attachment. Oh, yes, he called again and again-very often, in fact. He called with varying success, as sometimes he found the ladies alone, sometimes with many visitors; for Mdlle. Francesca's circle of acquaintance was rapidly enlarging. He met men he knew there, some one or two, the very sighs of whom in that little drawing-room made him grind his teeth with rage. Yet he could not blame discovered and catalogued, and science is her. lady may be, she is bound to notice the addition to the ordinary contents of her drawing-room of a gentleman standing six feet in his stockings. So, with a start of surprise and a forced return to a semblance of her usual manner, she turned and greeted him. She smiled, but her eyes told of tears. Actress though she was, for once she failed in her art. It would have deceived no one, much less one who studied every look with the penetration of love. 'Tell me what vexes you,' he said, taking her hand. 'Let me know if I can help you.' 'Tell you!' she said, in a tone of wonderment, at the same time tossing into a wastepaper basket the tiny fragments of paper which the letter was now reduced to. 'Tell

'There are troubles a woman cannot tell her friends.'

'Yet tell me, are we not even more than friends, Frances?' The moment had come, he knew. He was speaking in that tone which tells, more than words, how a man's heart is moved. She made no pretence of misunderstanding him, but she disengaged the hand he again tried to take. Her eyes fell to the ground, and she was silent for a while. He waited until she spoke; then her voice was scornful, but full of passion, although the words came carrying it into her next door neighbor's slowly and distinctly. 'Shall I tell you that two men have offered me their love to-day-in clear language, written language?'

His face flushed, then grew pale. 'Yes,' she continued, 'and both are lichboth court their income by thousands. One of them,' she added, with a scarcely perceptible gesture toward the torn-up letter, bears one of the noblest and highest titles in the land.' 'And what else ?' asked Allan, who knew she had more to say. 'There is only one little thing -perhaps even you will think it strange that an actress or a singer should take it into consideration -they both happen to be married.' There was biting scorn in the last words. Allan ground his teeth.

The letters might have been written by the same hand,' she continued, 'the wording is so similar. Is there a peculiar form in such cases?
