A Cardinal Sin.
CHAPTER XVII
COUPLED WITH CRUELTY.

Philip Bouchier had never for an instant doubted the truth of Digby's assertion that Frances was John Bouchier's daughter. He was gradually becoming superstitious. He saw how, in every way, events had turned against him since that fatal night—how, when everything had seemed hushed up and at an end, this witness, or second-hand witness, to every act of his on that occasion had appeared and spoiled everything—how he had been punished through the medium that could really wound him—his love for his children. Seeing and thinking of all this, he began to believe in destiny; and it appeared the most natural thing that Allan should have chosen for his wife Frances Bouchier.

Had his feelings been less those of a fatalist there was plenty to confirm Digby's words. When Allan married Frances, it is doubtful whether he knew anything about it. He had left his bankers with some valuable property in his possession; no one knew of what it consisted, but it must have been valuable. Since then he had not been heard of. It may be that Mr. Tremble spoke of James Bouchier, of Newham, but the name awoke no suspicion in Allan's mind. He was out a child when the last lawsuit took place, and the matter was tabooed in the family. The less such things are talked about the better.

On her side Frances said little about her forefathers. She was too sensible not to know that, as simply the daughter of a tradesman, she was not a proper match for Allan Bouchier. As Miss Frances, who would, she believed, in time be known as one of the greatest singers of the day, she felt she was any man's equal. Leaving her beauty and great gifts out of the question, and looking only from a pecuniary point of view, she would in a few years be earning a princely income. She was not ashamed of her forefathers, but there is often as much vulgarity in flouting one's humble origin in people's faces as in resorting to pitiful and transparent expedients to conceal it. Had she been asked, the information would have been at once given; but she did not volunteer it. To Allan she often spoke of her father, and always expressed the gratitude she felt to him for having given her an education so much above the station in life he occupied.

At Redhill, by common consent, no one now spoke of Mr. Bouchier's encounter with the midnight assassin. Soon after it occurred, it became apparent to his family that any allusion to the affair vexed him, so it was rapidly becoming a tradition. Frances had heard that he had once been compelled to shoot a man in self-defence; but having in her girlhood's days seen several men who had been credited with the same interesting exploit, asked very few questions about the matter. She had been told the event occurred several years ago; but had she known the very date it would have suggested nothing to her. She knew that her father had met his death somewhere in London, having been traced from Newham thither; so, if Digby could only be kept quiet and away from Frances, the secret might be a secret forever. Is it then strange that Mr. Bouchier sacrificed his money to the cause?

When the second visit to Redhill was paid, he had asked Allan some particulars about his wife's father. Allan told him all he knew; and Mr. Bouchier, aware of circumstances of which his son was ignorant, saw that his tormentor's narrative was true in every respect. He was also able to learn the self-styled Digby Bouchier's true name. He could be none other than George Manders whom Frances was so eager to find. But it was little use to him learning who the impostor really was.

"I shouldn't trouble in the matter, Allan," he said. "He is certainly murdered; and after this interval no good can be gained, even if the truth is found out."
"I am very much of your opinion; but my poor girl is so anxious."
"Well, at any rate, if you find this fellow Manders, hear his tale yourself before he sees Frances. Then you can judge if she should know the truth."
"Yes! I'll do that," said Allan.

This counsel cost Mr. Bouchier much to give. He was lying to his son—a terrible thing for a proud man to be obliged to do. He hoped, if the truth must come out, it would come to Allan first. He might forgive him and pity him; Frances, he felt, would never forgive.

The sojourn at Redhill came to an end. Allan and his wife went from there to Shortlands. Frances was not sorry at the change. Do what she would she could not entirely throw off the feeling that something or another lay between her and Mr. Bouchier. At Shortlands all went merrily. Mabel found herself every day growing more and more affectionately disposed to her new sister, while her husband looked upon her as a being from another sphere. He was a simple, kind-hearted gentleman, with a great reverence for genius. To have such a woman as Miss Frances beneath his roof, was to him a great honor. Lords and ladies were every-day guests, but a prima donna was a rarity. So Frances was made much of; and Allan would have been quite happy had it not been for the approaching trials of the operatic season. However, bad as they might be in London, they would be nothing as compared with his American experiences.

"I hope you will see something of Josephine in town," said Mabel to Frances. It was on the day before the visit ended, and the ladies were sitting alone.
"I will try to do so," answered Frances. "She is a dear little thing; but oh! what a sad life she has. A husband she must abhor and no baby to brighten her life."
Here Mrs. Messier kissed the future peer, who lay in her arms, as if he were but an ordinary baby.

"I will write to her as soon as we are settled," said Frances, "and beg her to come and see me often. I would call, but Allan does not wish it."
"No—he is quite right there. Her husband is a bad man. She will understand why you do not call."

Good Advice.
DAR SIRS,—I have been troubled with a headache for over 40 years, and had it so bad about once a week that I was sometimes not expected to live. I was advised to use B. B. B. and have used three bottles. I now have an attack once in four or five months, and feel that if I continue to use it I will be entirely cured. Therefore I recommend it highly.
