 CHAPTER XIV.
 INCIDENTS.
 Josephine called on Allan's wife after her marriage. She was determined not to like her, and partly succeeded in keeping her resolve. Her manner was somewhat constrained and her politeness forced. Frances saw it, and read clearly her disapproval of the marriage. She was a far prouder and more sensitive woman than her visitor; but her heart was kindly disposed to a sister of her husband whose life was such an utter wreck, so she said nothing about the matter to Allan.

"You would like me to call on your sister some day?" she asked him.
 "No; I would much rather not. I would rather you never entered her husband's house. Make poor little Josephine welcome here whenever she comes, and explain to her that I do not wish you to call. She will understand perfectly why it is."
 "Very well," said Frances.
 "You have nothing of her husband, I suppose?"
 "How should I, why do you ask?"
 "Josephine fancied he hinted at having met you somewhere." She shook her head.
 "I knew no one named Bouchier until I knew you."
 Bouchier sounds such a different word to Boucher that even the name of Digby being coupled with it awoke no associations in her mind. Perhaps she had forgotten; perhaps never heard the Christian name of that believed infant brother whom she had never seen.

So it was, that although Frances and George Mauders were now so closely connected by marriage they never came in contact. He was in no hurry to meet her. As soon as Mr. Bouchier left the world he would have a chat with Allan. He fancied Mr. Bouchier was not destined to live long.
 He knew what his true complaint was, and from time to time jugged it on by demands of money and threats. He could wait awhile and see. If Philip Bouchier's health improved, it was to him the true position of Allan's wife must be told; with him the bargain must be made—perhaps a supplementary one with Allan. He would make no mistake this time. A large sum down, and a freer, merrier life in the new world. He was getting tired of London. He would take care not to lose over this time anything of Josephine, chiefly at Allan's request, came several times to his house; but no affection sprung up between the sisters-in-law.
 Digby's words and insinuations were always coming back to Josephine. His manner had persuaded her that for once he was not lying.
 His astuteness had been too natural to be counterfeited. Although she was compelled to own that Frances' beauty was enough to shade Allan from the charge of rashness; although she could not find in her heart, word, or deed anything to object to, the feeling that the match was an unseemly one for her brother could not be got rid of.
 However, she kept her fears to herself, and in her letters to her mother and Mabel said nothing that was not favorable to her new sister-in-law.

Had Digby chosen to tell her any more she would not have listened. She was too proud to permit him to insinuate anything to the detriment of the girl who was now her brother's wife. It was not likely, therefore, that she would in any way approach the subject again. On his side Digby said no more. His ambiguous words had done all he needed, in preventing his wife and Frances from becoming friends and allies, and so lessened the danger of a premature revelation.

Allan had now been married some two months, and was beginning to realize all the advantages and some of the disadvantages of being the husband of such a famous woman as Mlle. Frances. As it is the fate of such a very small number of men to marry a prima donna, I shall be doing little harm, or be likely to change plans of life, by enumerating some of the disadvantages. If the words convey a warning, that warning will concern so few that they are not worth considering. Anyway, it is an undoubted fact that few gentlemen of position have married distinguished singers who still keep to the boards without eventually regretting it. A man may be a bad man, but the interference of a melodious pastycook with his domestic arrangements must be a trying affair. Yet Allan can scarcely be blamed if he refused to be alarmed by the misfortunes which had happened to other men whose example he was following. Was not Frances different from and better than any other woman in the world?

So they were married, as related, in the quietest manner possible. Mr. Trenfield gave the bride away. Mrs. Trenfield and Mrs. Melville were in the church, and Herr Kaulitz, who was let into the secret, and disapproved altogether of the proceedings. To his mind, for the next three or four years Frances should have thought about nothing but her art. Her love should only be the simulated passion for the tenor here of the particular opera she sang in. She should conquer in every great city in the world before she thought of marrying herself with a husband. This done, she might, if she wished to do so, make a brilliant match—marry a title, and in a blaze of glory and success leave the stage, if she thought fit.
 But to marry an ordinary country gentleman like Allan; to go over the world with a husband following her everywhere—it was monstrous! He did not dislike the young man; indeed, he was disposed to view him with favor. He was handsome, clever, kind, and devoted to Frances. He did not blame Allan—any one would wish to marry such a girl. It was Frances he blamed.
 "Ach! she is not a woman," he said disempathetically. "I thought she was something more."
 He hit the bolt exactly. She was but a woman. She loved Allan, and so she married him.
 And why not? She had no one save herself to consult. No one who had a right to say a word, unless it were the acute manager, who had bound her to himself for three years. This gentleman was immensely disgusted when she deigned to inform him of her intentions. He remonstrated and prophesied all manner of evil, but his interference was of no avail. He had no wish to interfere with her happiness, but he did not like dealings with married prima donnas. He had had some bitter experiences with husbands, who had been even more exasperating in the matter of contracts than the wives. Francesca was his for three years, and he looked on further than that. He even remonstrated with Allan; not that he hoped to gain anything by that, but it relieved his mind.
 "My dear fellow," he said—being an im-
