he asked. 'Of course I do. 'I can't fancy Francesca, Mrs. Allan Bourchier. She still goes on singing,

'For a while, at least.' 'Well, old fellow, I hope you'il be happy; but you'll find it a hardish life sometimes, I expect. It's a regular upheaval of family tradition, isn't it?' 'Very much so; but we're both happy, and that's all I want. 'Just so. I shall call if you will allow

'Do; we shall always be glad to see you.' So Pierrepont called, and many other people called. Every one in London seemed to want to make the acquaintance of Mdlle. Francesca, as she was universally designated. Great people wanted her to come to their houses. Invitations poured in. Many were refused-many were accepted. With some of them it was an impossibility to do else but accept; so that, leaving her professional duties out of the question, Frances found her hours fully occupied. Allan accompanied her when and where he could. It was fortunate for the young man that he was known in society, but it was not without some feeling of annoyance that he found his status changed. He was not Mr. Bourchier, but Mddle. Francesca's husband. Men always object to a distinction of this sort.

That she should be triumphant, sought after, and honored, pleased him-it seemed but her due. But oh! if it could only have been as his wife that people asked her to their houses. It was from no selfishness that he wished he had been the notable one. There was nothing he could do for her. Her position in the world was her own. A man likes to think his wife is a more important personage for having married him; Allan was entirely debarred from this pleasant sentiment. The very money they lived upon, or the greater part of it, came from her. What had he given her? What could he give her, Nothing but love, and this she returned in affections of the Throat and Lungs. full, so there was no obligation on that tender score.

There were some invitations to Mdlle. Francesca which, as they emanated from Royalty, were commands. Several of the Royal personages in England are extremely musical. So, once or twice, Mdlle. Francesca was invited to display her talents for their benefit. It was flattering, but the feeling that his wife was at anybody's beck and call, whoever that body might be, jarred I find no better remedy for it. upon the husband. Only at times he wished things had been different. Happy as they were, they might be so much happier in a private capacity. So he drew charming pictures of Frances the mistress at Redhills, beloved and admired by all, and his very own every hour of his life-Mrs. Allan Bourchier; not Mdlle. She guessed that the day Francesca began to wane in public favor would be the dawn of new and greater happiness to Allau. Mrs. Melville, although she understood him and sympathized, was frightened. If it were so now, what would it be in some years' time.

'There is always one comfort,' she said; 'the public may be his rival, but never any particular member of it. That would be too terrible; but with Frances it can never hap-

All other members of Allan's family had with since childhood. She is now twelve behaved much better to his wife than had that poor unhappy little Josephine. Mr. Bourchier had begged Allan to bring her to Redhills whenever he could do so, and Mrs. Bourchier, who, we may presume, had made her enquiries and been satisfied, brought herself to second her husband's request. Even Mabel, who for important reasons, had not been to town this season, as soon as this safely alone for a day, came up with her husband and called. Now Mabel was the fur. proudest of the Bourchiers, and it was this very pride which would not permit her to leave Allan's wife unnoticed. So she came up to her duty and found it a pleasure. Next week the public were told that arrangements had been made for Mdile. Francesca to visit America at the end of the London season; but the public grief at her loss was somewhat mitigated by the assurance that she would be one of the great attractions at the London opera next year.

for two reasons. The first is because many patrons who have been given credit, have abused the privilege to such an extent as to make the business of publishing the paper a non-paying one, and it is necessary, in my own interest and that of those who do pay, that I should no longer continue to furnish the ADJANCE to those non-paying subscribers.
