If she followed a profession against which some vulgar prejudice still lingered, she was at the top of the tree in it, and her name was above reproach. Still, as he came mile by mile nearer his destination his sentiments were less sanguine. Difficulties began to crop up, and he saw objections forming with fearful rapidity. However, in spite of all that might arise, there was but one thing to think of. He loved her passionately, and he was pledged to marry her-marry her at shadow which, rightly or wrongly, is supposed by some to be cast by the stage. He spoke so firmly, so confidently, and as one so grateful for the happiness he had won, that Mr. Bourchier, knowing his son's disposition, was compelled to feel that for good or for ill the thing was settled; that opposition from him, although lamented, would be disregarded. The news was grievous news to him, but he heard all that Allan had to say without comment or betraying how i affected him. He was disappointed, but somehow of late years he had given up expecting to get any more gratification from

'I suppose, Allan,' he sail, as his son ceased speaking, and looked for his reply, 'that you mean to please yourself in this matter, whether I consent or not?' Allan made no reply.

He did go and see her-next day. It was by his own request. Frances received him DERAVIN & CO. gladly, naturally, without embarrassment. Then he went back home and told his wife that he should offer no opposition to Allan's marriage. His word was law with Mrs. Bourchier, so the matter was at an end. He used exactly the same words to Allan, LEON. DERAVIN, Consular Agent for France. who thanked him, but added he feared none when his father and Frances once met.

'By the by, Allan,' he said, as they parted, 'what is her right name?' 'Not unlike our own-Boucher.' Hi father shuddered. It was an ominous name. He looked upon it as a pure coincidence. Boucher is not uncommon. Japanned, Stamped

'Yes,' replied Allan, who always considered her so. He fancied his father had a prejudice against Americans, and saw no reason for awaking it. 'Who are her connections?' 'She has no relatives-she is an orphan.

'She is English, I suppose?'

All the better, thought his father, and there the matter ended. How little Frances thought whose blood was on the hand of the man she was both pleased and proud to welcome-Allan's

Why was Philip Bourchier, a man, proud some of the worse senses of the word, so easily induced to give his consent or withhold his opposition to his son's marriage with Mdlle. Francesca, the singer? To know why, you must look into the man's secret thoughts; then you will perhaps understand. To begin with, he was passionately fond of his children, and the fear that was gnawing at his heart, day by day, sapping his health, was that with the knowledge possessed by Manders the hour might come when he might have to stand before his childrennot, perhaps, a convicted but a proven murderer. The sword might fall at any moment-the eyes of those who, if they feared, yet loved and respected him, might turn from him in horror and grief-their lives even as his would be blighted by the crime. At any cost he would keep his children's love as long as he could. If Allan some day should mutely accuse and blame him, it should not be in his power to say he had thrown other obstacles in the way of what he had determined was his happiness in life. He knew that Allan would walk in his own path-so be it. He had chosen, and he might be right in his choice-but, right or wrong, father and son should be friends till the dreaded hour came. Allan and Frances were married in a few weeks time-married so quietly that not half-a-dozen people knew it. So well was the secret kept that when it became public property it was almost too long past an event for the journals of the day to trouble much about. They feared to retail stale news; and fresh-cull ed gossip is the life of a society paper. They were very, very happy. Nevertheless a private gentleman who marries a primo donna must indeed be a sanguine man if he thinks that his life is to be quite free from annoyance and trouble,
