Fine voices seem to have an attraction for our family.' Certainly, Josephine was not afraid of her

He said nothing, but, resuming his cigar, thought as intently as his aching head would allow him to think; and as Josephine, who was wondering at the surprise he had displayed, watched him, she saw a wicked amile-half malice, not triumph-flit over his face several times. The smile well expressed his thoughts. This marriage must be to his advantage. He hated Allan Bourchier. Doubtless it is pleasant for a bad man to hold his enemy's happiness in his hand; to be able to bid it vanish whenever he choses to speak the word. It was a new combination, after his own heart. Allan's marriage with his cousin would certainly confirm him in the possession of Redhills: but when he succeeded to his ininheritance, what would he be willing to used Hagyard's Yellow Oil, and must say pay Digby to conceal the fact that his I find no better remedy for it. father was the murderer of his wife's father? The only danger to be guarded against was a premature disclosure. He must keep the more carefully out of Mrs. Allan Bourchier's way, and it would be well to keep Josephine away from her. They were all in his power now ! He was so exultant that his wife saw it and feared. What did it mean? She did good health. Burdock Blood Bitters will not, however, condescend to inquire. 'So Allan the grand is going to marry the
