Josephine's quick eye had caught the writing. She knew well enough whose it was Why should this man-the worst man in the world-be writing to Frances? What could it all mean? And Frances ate her strawberries, with her eyes, it seemed, looking into vacancy, Mrs. Melville remarked that the servant said someone was waiting for an answer. Frances made no reply-she was thinking what to do. Josephine would have given a great deal to have known the contents of that letter from her husband.

She would not have been much enlightened had the letter been passed te her for perusal. She might, knowing what she knew of Digby's ways, have been more frightened-nothing else. It ran thus: 'I have arranged everything. If you would know all, go to Charing Cross; take the 12.30 to B -. Take the road to the village, and walk on until you meet me. You cannot miss your way. The man I spoke of is ready to see you, and will speak of everything. If you don't come by the train I name I shall conclude you have changed your mind. "P. S .- Remember, I do not urge you. Even now I think you had better let the thing rest. I need not say, if you come, you must come alone. What answer was she to give? To a certain extent she mistrusted the man as mu as even Josephine did. Yet, why in this one thing should he play her false? What had he to gain? Nothing-absolutely nothing. He did not urge her to obey his summons-he seemed quite indifferent whether she came or not. No evil could result from her going for an hour or two to a little village like B-, moreover in broad daylight. She was accountable to none but Allan, and he was away. Come what will she must learn her father's fate. And as she thought of the father who had always been so fond of her, the victim of cowardly assassins, the blood rose to her cheek, and her whole face seemed to imply that she had taken a great resolve. Then she drew the letter once more from the cover and reperused it. Who can blame Josephine, who saw the look, the the circumstances, their true meaning.

Postscripts are important things. It was that careless postscript that made Frances decide to follow the instructions of the letter. It was the off-hand, I-don't-care-ifyou-come way that gave her faith in the writer's integrity. With Josephine still watching her, she tore the fly-leaf from the letter, scribbled three words on it, put the paper in an envelope, and without addresing it sent it to the waiting messenger.

'You never get a moment's peace, my dear,' cried Mrs. Melville, picking out one or two of the ripest strawberries and putting them on Frances's plate.

Frances thanked her with a smile. 'I want a time-table,' she said.

The time-table was brought. She looke at it, and verified the time given in the let ter. A B C time-tables are a great boon especially to women. As Frances passed the finger down the column which told of the departure of trains for B-, the juice of the strawberries made a little rosy mark on the margin of the page. Josephine no-'Will you want the brougham this morning, ma'am?' asked the servant, who came in to clear away the breakfast things. 'The coachman is down-stairs.' 'Yes; I shall want it at twelve o'clock said Frances.

The brougham came as ordered. "Char ing Cross,' she said, stepping into it. Josephine noticed that she was dressed in the quietest and simplest garb; that she carried a thick veil in her hand. She felt that something terrible was going to happen. Allan away-the letter coming-France's unmistakable preoccupation—the hastily scribbled answer-the reference to the time-tablethe brougham ordered, and the departure alone, with no word as to returning. She grew very nervous, and as soon as Mrs. Melville was called away to housekeeping duties, flew to the time-table. Her worst fears were confirmed. On the very page which bore the name of B-was the pink stain which had been transferred from Frances's finger. And B- was the postmark and even the address of those letters which she had taken from the safe on the night when Digby, her husband, in his drunken rage, had struck Melville. her. Frances had gone to B---.

After dinner Josephine grew thoroughly frightened; even Mrs. Melville felt nervous at such a prolonged absence on the part of Frances. Now that, in her innermost heart, Josephine dreaded the worst that could happen, she began to tell herself that her suspicions and fears were ludicrous. Frances had met or called on some friends, and had have met with some accident, or been enbeen persuaded to stay with them. Very probably she had gone to Mrs. Trenfield's. 'Come back at once -you are wanted-do not delay,' it ran Being sent by Josephine, he knew that he was wanted back for Frances's sake. Some thing had happened to his wife, or the telegram would have been sent from her. He turned pale, but said nothing. Glancing at his watch he saw the time was ten o'clock. He had not a moment to spare. He knew the times of the trains from Brackley by heart; there was nothing he could catch from that station which would enable him to get to town before six o'clock in the evening. He must drive to Blacktown and catch the midday express-he had two hours and ten minutes to do it in-the distance of good twenty miles. Every moment was He ran across to the stables. 'Put the fastest horse in the lightest trap,'
