Apart from that the expenses of living of the people had increased, and that was a circun stance which could not fail to operate upon the government as well as upon private business. The disappointment u himself and colleagues over the census had been great. Instead of an increase of 40,000 people the official figures showed an increase of 37. The subj ct of keeping the people in the province wis one that ought to engage the united efforts and energy of the legislature. He was not going to say that was responsible for the showing of the pas ten years. Probably some of it was caused by the fact that the census was taken on different basis from the last one.

THE NATIONAL POLICY

He discussed at length the basis of th financial settlement at confederaton, claiming that the fathers of confederation could never have contemplated that the reburces of this province would be drawn upon for railway subsidies to the extent of ove $2,000,000. It was anticipated at that time that public works would be attended to by the government, and his (Mitchell's) opinion now was that they should be attended to by the general government. Up to 1874 the revenue of the province met the expenditure very fairly, but in that year a railway subsidy act was passed which was only the precursor of others by which the bonded debt had been piled up. He was not going to find fault with the government of that day for passing that act. They were forced into it by their supporters, and the latter FORCED INTO IT BY THE FEOPLE.

It has been said that under the subsidy act of 1882 the government was only bound to construct 250 miles of railway. To his mind this was the sheerest nonsense. Both of these acts referred to were matters of compromise, and it was impossible to erect roads in one section without other sections getting their proper propertion. Every part of the province had an equal right to railway facilities.

New Brunswick was also placed in a dif ferent position from some other provinces when she entered confederation. In Ontario the highway and
