A STRANGE STORY.

BY NANCY NUGENT.

Copyright by the Author, 1892. I was called one night to visit the wife of an old friend who had been married about two years. They lived in the suburbs of a large city. My friend was editor of one of the city pa-land's wife, only a short time before he had married her. She was very beautiful. Dark as midnight, and as dreamy. I had not seen either of them for nearly a year. Previous to that I had spent all my spare time with them. At their pretty home, I had been treated as a brother, Mrs. Pentland calling me by my name, Jack, and I called her, Letty: They were perfectly happy in their married life. As I hastened onward, I tried to picture to myself the change there might be in one year. I had known them so well, and knew how happy they were that I was wholly unprepared for the great change that had taken place. As I sprang from my carriage the front door opened and Paul stood waiting me. I ran up the steps and shook hands with him. When he drew me into the hall, and I was enabled to see his face, I uttered an exclamation of surprise.

"Come this way, Jack, and I will tell We were soon sitting in Paul's room, and, looking into his troubled eyes, I wondered if it were possible to change from the bright happy Paul of one year ago, into the haggard, weary man of to-

How beautiful her eyes were; no insanity there. Could it be that Paul did abuse her? Surely, no. Paul could not do so base an act. As I advanced she reached out her hand to me. "Jack, you have come at last. I thought you would never come; does he

'I believe my husband is insane. At least at times he must be. Oh! it is horrible to live day after day in such dread. His violence is fiendish, and I have been so good to him and bear it all without complaining. I not only suffer the physical pain at the time, but for days before I know that he will come and cruelly torment me. I am in constant fear of him. Oh, Jack! I am married to a maniac. Can you realize the awful horror of such a married life? Why, oh, why am I so made that I know those awful scenes will happen for days before they take place? I suffer so terribly. The agony I endure while I wait and wait for the time to come is almost unbearable, yet I dare not defend myself or ask anyone to help me, for they would know that Paul is insane-a madman. Yet only on one subject: he thinks I have been untrue to him. To-day, tomorrow, or it may not be until the day after, I know it will come; but how I know I cannot understand, he will come to me and will stand by my bed and will clench his hands, his mouth will work until foam oozes from his pallid lips. He seems unable to speak. Then with his eyes scintillating and projecting from their sockets, his white lips drawn back from his teeth, he will stoop slowly over me, the while opening and closing | Horn. those long, thin fingers, until I can feel his breath; then, with a rapid movement, he places his cold, clammy fingers around my throat, and in a hoarse whisper he will say: 'False, false as hell!' and mysterious. with horrible strength he closes his fingers and I know nothing until I hear my maid asking me what is the matter, and all I can say is, "I dare not tell.' They do not know he is insane. Can we keep it from them? Servants talk so, you know. I will trust you, Jack, to cure him; they say you have become clever. Will you try?' I promised I would do what I could and left her, saving I would see her in the morning. Paul met me in the hall, looking anxious. "Well, what do you think about her; is she ill or insane?' "I cannot say she is insane. To-night there was absolutely nothing to indicate such a state of health. She talked most rationally and her health seems good. I will see her in the morning." "Will you stay with us all night? have been expecting her to have one of those terrible turns for some days; she has them about every two weeks. You would understand the case better were you to see her at such a time.

I consented, and after half an hour's talk Paul proposed that I wait in the hall and if I heard her scream enter immediately, and I would find her at I seated myself just outside the door, which had been left slightly open. Paul went in, and I heard his steps approach the bed. I waited breathlessly for the degrading accusation Letty had prepared me for, but, as she had told me it was always whispered close to her face, I did not hear it. Soon I was terrified to hear the most heartrending screams I had ever heard. I could not move; they froze the blood in my veins. I sat as if mummified; then breaking the bondage of horror I hastened to her

There were two such marks, one on either cheek. A shudder of repulsion for my old friend shook me. Such a brutal action. Could it be that he was the insane one. I raised my eyes and looked at Paul; he stood watching Letty with the calmness of despair. He seemed unable to remove his gaze from her face as she lay watching him as if she feared another attack.

What is the matter? Why will you not tell me?' "I cannot, I dare not ell." The spell was broken. Letty turned with a little sigh, nestled down in the

I asked to be allowed to go to my own room immediately. I was tired and worried. Throwing myself on the bed as I was, I covered my eyes with my hands. I thought long into the night. I decided to watch Paul rather than night she was in bed. I went up to say Letty. She was not insane, but would be if his treatment of her continued.

"Well, my boy, you have become interested in the mysterious malady, insanity. It is a fascinating study. I have been thirty years among the insane, and I have not found two alike. Something new in each one. I have a woman under my care now whom I Newcastle, August 8, 1892. never allow an assistant to see. I have given her a special nurse; the cleverest and gentlest of my staff, who never leaves her and reports every day. I see her myself, every two days; yet her case baffles me. I will tell you all I arrive. know about her, then you will see her, she is beautiful as a picture, but I am sorry to say this last year she has failed very much. She has lost her rich red coloring and has become emaciated, but her glorious eyes can never change. About five years ago, shortly after I opened my asylum, there called a young man, evidently of a wealthy class. He said his only sister had a year previously married against the family's wishes, that the father had disinherited and disowned her, and had forbidden the family to even speak her name. He was the only one that had disobeyed the father's orders, and had visited her at the home Continued on 4th page.
