ERRY looked around. On a broad sweep of rock stood a small structure of logs neatly hewn, and wrought with glittering quartz, causing the building to look as if inlaid with diamonds. A few feet from the door sat he who had welcomed Terry as a victim for Ishmael. A sinuous man, strongly marked by Indian blood, yet not repulsively so. At the door on a block cut from the end of a log stood a girl. She held in her right hand a knife of highly polished steel; in her left a large piece of the quartz the house was incrusted with. She poised herself on her toes and was reaching above the door whittling a cavity to embed the glittering stone in. So ingrossed was she in her work she did not hear the wierd welcome. She was slightly tall, delicately molded and wore a dress, or rather a drapery, of silk, soft and white. It was gathered at the neck and fell straight to her feet ungirdled. Her feet were bare, but for shoes made in the old Italian style, that revealed the

it, too, was ungirdled. "Zell, another victim for Ishmael." She turned to the man, he pointed silently to Terry, who had landed and was coming to the house. Zell stepped off the block and turned to Terry. Her eyes were the same hue as her hair. mild and limpid as the water yonder, and in whose depths was that subtle something seen only in great depths, whether of water, valley or eyes-that something which beckons one to the very verge. At the verge you pause, tremulous with hunger, to follow, or fear to probe further that deep unknown. Terry drew a long breath as he gazed into those wonderously beautiful color seen only in the copper snake, and hung in rippling masses below her knees;

"What do you want?" asked Zell. "I want to know where I am?" A smile flitted over Zell's face, dapple ing the roseate loveliness of her face. "You are here."

"Yes, but where is here or what i

"I am here, Shem is here, you are here, and here is here. I have always been here and I know of nothing but "What do you call the place?"

Terry had not looked away from Zell all this time; now he turned and saw the place was a huge basin two miles broad and nearly four in length. A slip of rock ran around the water's edge like a shelf. On this gigantic shelf had ac cumulated matter enough to grow low shrubbery. Back of this a pile of nature's masonry reared itself perpendicularly hundreds of feet high. From

At the extreme end a second ledge or shelf jutted out over the lower one, but fully seven hundred feet above it. Above this again rose the rocks in sublime grandeur. From one end of this shelf a narrow road, partly low steps and part-ly slope, led down to the water and lower shelf. Here and there a rude railing had been constructed, but the precipice was principally unguarded. An occasional birch had drawn from the poor soil enough nourishment to keep life in their tenuous trunks and force a few trembling leaves to the branches. These trees were like ghostly sentinels guarding the cave of this se cluded Ishmael. The upper platform of rock was the whole width of the Tarn and projected a little less than a quarter of a mile. A most glorious doorstep for a most mysterious cave. The entrance to the cave was festooned by those ever-swaying vines. "I have never seen Zanea or Ishmael Nature has placed Zanea's home above mine. Why should I climb but to return? Why should Zanea descend but to go up again? See, our flat is just the same as theirs. The vines toss for me the same as for Zanea. The leaves put forth the same tints, and the waters ripple alike for both. The sun and moon see as does distant Zanea. At times I see her white robe flutter as she sees mine, what more?
