We cordially invite the public to call and amples of above work.

Allan was growing frightened. 'You must be mistaken, Josephine; or else HARDWARE STORES, Frances had good reasons for silence. Has he been here since?' which are too numerous to mention. 'No; but yesterday a letter came while we CALL EARLY. were at breakfast. I saw the writing -it was Digby's.'

'Go on,' said Allan, hoarsely. 'Someone was waiting for an answer. This Sale is positive and must be made to settle up Frances seemed to consider for a long time; then she wrote two or three words, and sent them by the messsenger. Then she asked for a time-table, ordered the brougham, and drove to Charing Cross. Allan! don't be angry with me. What could I think?' His face was full of fierce wrath.

Where is that dog of a husband of yours Melville's wild suggestion did not seem so staying?' he asked. 'At the Langham, isn't it?' | improbable to him. He was there. I think he has been there

Allan was out of the room before she had finished her sentence. Her first thought The new departure taken by his thoughts was to recall him, and tell him where she supposed his wife had gone to. But it might be better to let Allan inquire first if Digby was at the Langham. She ran to the window saw him jump into a cab, and drive off in the direction of the hotel. In twenty minutes he returned, and his appearance as he entered made his sister's heart ache-she scarcely knew her brother. His face was pale, and his blue eyes gleamed with suppressed rage. There was an air of relentless purpose about him which boded ill for Digby Bourchier. Josephine thought he looked at least ten years older. He strode into the room and shut the door.

'It is true-too true,' he said. Josephine's tears sprung to her eyes. 'Oh, Allan! what will you do?' 'Do!'-he spoke with a fierceness which startled her-there is but one thing for me to do. All men don't do it, but I shall.'

She knew what he meant. 'Run up-stairs and put a few things in a bag for me,' he said, speaking very calmly, but in a manner utterly unlike him. 'I must have something to eat and drink before Gillespie & Sadler. 1 go.

'Where are you going?' 'Where am I going? Why, to find my wife and your husband, Josephine. 'But where?' 'To Nice first; aftwerward, God knows

'Why should you go to Nice to look for 'Because Mr. Digby Bourchier let people at the hotel know that he and a friend were going together to Nice. He started from Charing Cross yesterday morning. He even left instructions for his letters to be sent to Manchester House, Josephine. But you won't blame me for He spoke without any inflated threatssimply as one who has made up his mind to do a perfectly natural thing-kill the man who had taken his wife away. 'Alian,' said Josephine, 'listen a moment THE LATEST STYLES.

'I can't stop; go and do as I tell you.'

'You, a clever man,' said Josephine, ought to know that if my husband has gone away, as you fear, the last address he would leave would be the right one.' Allan started. What if he were to go on the Continent on a fool's errand, and his absence give this villian time to get off free. 'No', said Josephine, 'he has never eftl England. Both he and Frances are here, almost close at hand.' BAND AND SCROLL - SAWING, should they have gone to B---? Josephine hung her head. Her tears were streaming down her cheeks. It seemed so When Allan Bourchier heard the astound dreadful to be the one to say such shameful ing assertion made by Josephine, his first things of her brother's wife-to hint at what thought was that she had taken leave of her senses. She must surely be mad to she suspected. But it must be done.

'Allan,' she said, 'may Heaven forgive me couple his wife's name with that of her if I am judging wrong. Do you remember rascally husband. However, he soon saw those two letters I gave you?" that she was as much in her right mind and 'Well, what of them?' he asked impatient-

The As 300n as he entered the room she sprung denial of any acquaintance with him would not in itself have much troubled Allan, but, taken in connection with subsequent events, it exercised him greatly. The truth is, that ly that Josephine regretted the exaggeration Allen had a vein of jealousy in his composition; it had never been trenched upon until now. As it was, when he thought of the instantaneus recognition and warm welcome described by Josephine as given by his wife to Digby Bourchier, the prolonged interview afterward, the letter in his handwriting, the answer sent, the immediate departure by train, he began to wonder whether it could be possible that the woman who he thought loved him had left him at the call of another. Worse-far worse than anything, was the wish she had expressed to Josephine that nothing might be said about her visitor for a few days. Could it be that he was to be added to the many who have been utterly deceived and wrecked by women on whose loyalty they would have staked their salvation? If so, he would at least take a man's revenge on the villian who had brought shame on him-a good, old-fashioned, thorough revenge. Allan Bourchier set his teeth. He was in that frame of mind in which a man does dark and terrible deeds. Perhaps in all the Bourchiers there was drop of tiger's blood which came to the surface when occasion called for it. Yet, again and again his wife's face rose before him, as he had last, as he had always seen it-pure, true, and beautiful. Again and again he thought of her as he had always found her-without one thought of evil. No, he swore to himself it could not be true-it should not be true. Men have always been deceived by women again and again, but not by a woman like Frances She had gone away for some good reason; even if she had gone with Digby Bourchier, it was still for some good reason. She would explain everything when they met-

Then he remembered what in his agitation he had forgotten until now. To-night she was to sing in opera. She who had never yet disappointed the public, and often vowed she never would do so. Yet she was away. For the once her devotion to the stage concould not believe evil of Frances; but, in the phine had been compelled to hint at that soled him. It was more than the evil Joseface of Josephine's tale, could not doubt that kept his wife away. Yet this comfort openshe left her house owing to the letter sent by ed up a new source of dread. Could any Digby. He must do something to set his bodily harm have befallen her? Could she be-his blood ran cold-dead. Even Mrs.

> How slowly the train went! Should they never get to B-? Yet he had not much hope, or rather fear, of finding her thereseemed to forbid it. Why should she have gone to B- with his sister's husband Oh, what a blight that man had cast on the whole family! He ground his teeth again, and his former frame of mind returned.

B-at last! Now, what was he to do? He must find his way to the village and inquire the whereabouts of 'The Shrubbery'. He walked along the same road Frances walked the day before, and came to the sleepy little village. There he entered a saddler's shop and began his inquiries. Continued on 4th Page.
