A Cardinal Sin.

·Can you tell me if there is a place near hear called 'The Shrubbery'?' 'Yes, sir; about half a mile out of town. Keep straight along the road, and you'll pass it on the left hand.' Allan noticed the tradesman eyed him curiously as he replied to his inquiry. 'Who lives there?' he asked.

The saddler laughed. 'If you don't know, I'm sure I don't,' he said with a meaning smile. Allan frowned.

If I knew I should not ask you. Kindly a liberty, and hastened to atone for it. We none of us exactly knowwho lives there,' he said. 'Someone who called herself Mrs. Montague lived there a few weeks ago, but she's gone and the place has been shut up since.

'Is it shut up now?' 'That I can't say, sir. I saw Mr. Mon tague pass through the village yesterday morning, and I haven't seen him pass back again; so he may be there.'

'We none of us known exactly who Mr Montague is,' said the saddler.

'Describe him to me.' The saddler did so, and Allen knew tha Montague was Digby Bourchier. The tradesman's manner told him percisely in what light 'The Shrubbey' and its late tenaut were looked upon by the B -- folk; and Allen's blood boiled as he remembered he was seeking his wife there. It could not -it must be some horrible mistake. 'Do you think this Mr. Montague is there now?' he asked. 'Well-yes, I think so,' said the saddler, with a cunning smile on his face. 'Oh, yes, I think so certainly.'

'Why?' asked Allen setting his teeth. 'Well, you see an hour after Mr. Montague went by yesterday, I was looking out at the door, and I saw a young woman pass-such a pretty creature she was, too!"

spoke his whole body tingling 'She was a pretty creature! Well she Montague-that's all.'

fears were confirmed. He could not doubt but the young women who had excited his informant's admiration and pity was his own wife. She had gone yesterday to 'The Shrubbery. She had stayed there ever since. She was there now-and her companion was the middle of the window sash. He made this Montague—this Digby Bourchier under a false name. It was all over! All but vengence. He would take a man's vengence. Life was nothing to him now. He would the way he could put his hand in and undo kill this villain, and then-never mind and the fastening. Yes, he could get in easily then': nothing mattered afterward.

Allen left the shop and walked as fast as he could in the direction of 'The Shrubbery.' He would have ran at his top speed, but he did not want to attract the attention of the villagers. He was soon at the fence which surrounded the garden of the cottage. He glanced up and down the road and seeing no one, placed his hands on the top of the palings drew himself up and looked over. He was none the wiser for so doing, as a thick hedge hid everything inside from his sight. He dropped back on the road, and walked on until he came to the gate through which passed the day before. was a strong rustic gate, through the crevices of which he could peer and see a winding path with shrubs on each side. There was no one in sight, so, placing his foot on one of the crossbars of the rustic gate, in a moment he was inside the fence. He walked rapidly along the winding path until it emerged from the shrubs and led up to the house door. Then he paused to reand, as he saw the cottage, a feeling of joy came over him. His fears groundless—the house was absolutely deserted. The whole garden around it uncared for and full of weeds, the grass on the lawn glass with a diamond ring, but, after a few untrimmed, and every window in the house with shutters up. It was plain that no properly, and Allan contrived to make a one was about.
