His hands were outstretched, as if to ward off a blow. His face was livid as with some great exertion. He began speaking, with that subdued force heard in the few first thunder peals of a violent

"She has gone! Great heavens, she has gone from me, and I loved her! I am black and coarse, yet I loved her! Oh, Father, why hast Thou put in forms black, crooked, deformed, loathesome and repulsive that hunger for love, that can never, never come to us! Why hast Thou made some of us deficient in body, yet left the ability to feel that sublimest madness, love!"

Over the agonized face a weary smile if speaking to Zanea. "She would have said, patience, Shem. Yes, Zanea, I will be patient.

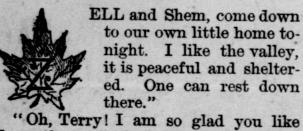

Thou wert a noble example. He was as simple as a child when he promised Zanea he would be patient. All the passion was controlled and he thought only to do as Zanea wished Zell had watched Shem in wonder. Now she crept to him; taking his hand in hers she said:

"Now you are my old Shem. I feared thee as I saw thee just now. Shem be gentle with me always. I did not know that tempests were in aught but the air and clouds. You said you loved Zanea. Father Ambrose told me when last we talked that the love man gives woman is to her what the steady, gentle rain is to the drooping flowers. Thy love is like a tempestuous thunder blast and would beat the flowers down."

"Ah, child, thou art a sweet, frail daisy. Thou shalt receive the steady, gentle rain of love Father Ambrose told thee of. Nature supplies the even, steady dew and rain for its frailest and loveliest blossoms. But Zell, Zell, see yonder on the mountain top are vines and trees whose roots reach into the crevices in the rocks great distances. Those trees and vines are fixed, almost as the rocks themselves. They need the downpouring rain and can stand against those tempestuous thunder blasts. But come, we dally while Ishmael waits his

"Terry, am I to go with you out beyond where so many gather? Where more like you live? What will it be She had risen in her eagerness and stood before Terry. She clasped her little hands and looked into Terry's eyes as if trying to see the world there. Terry's heart beat now and he found it rather trying. He wondered if out where others like himself lived, others who were beautiful to look at, others who had soft words and winning ways, there were those whom Zell would find the world in. His face flushed and the dark eyes glowed, showing clearly his wish to do as Jack had thought he would do-pick Zell up and just appropriate her, but he did not. Shem stole sadly away to hide his grief, and Zell, disappointed at Terry's silence, pouted prettily, saying coyly: "Why will you not answer, Terry?"

"Zell, do you like me?" "Like you? Oh, yes! almost as much as I do Shem."

"Were you forced to give up Shem or me, which would go?" "Terry, why do you ask such queer things? You might as well ask me which I would give up, the sun or the moon. I love both; one is warmth, the other coolness. Shem is warm-you are cold. The sun lights and heats the day, but through all the space between evening and the morn, the moon shines steadily. If there was a night to my life, Terry, I would choose you. You are so still and calm. Terry—."

"Yes, Zell." "Is there a night to our lives?" "Little one, there comes a time of darkness to all our lives; shadows gather thick and fast; sorrows and troubles come and all seems gloom. Zell, will you choose me?"

"Yes, Terry." He gathered her in his arms, his hand stroked caressingly her lovely face; then he bowed his head and looked tenderly into her eyes a moment. He seemed loth to partake of the joy of this, the first kiss. All things have an end, even hesitation. Now he seemed loth to end this, the first kiss, yet even that ends. There are those who toss off words gracefully as doth you fern toss golden pollen from its tasselated flowers. There are those who, to look at, move even me, Zell."

Zell sought the support of Terry's strong arms, and Shem turned partly away. He stood like a pine tree, sombre and alone. "Zell and Zanea both gone," was all he said, and it counded like the sighing pines more than a human voice. A moment he stood thus, then he said,

Zell had on a white dress of muslin. It was frilled and decked with blue ribbon bows. Her feet were encased in leather boots, heavy and coarse, and much too large for her. "We will have to adopt a name for her, then. What shall it be?" "Terry Denver, I am unfit to give thee advice. Choose a name thyself." "Will we call her after Father Ambrose? He was, as she said, the only father she knew about. It is a pretty name, too, and she would like it."

I have made the foregoing changes in the business of the ADVANCE

The first is because many patrons who have been given credit, have abused the privilege to such an extent as to make the business of publishing the paper a non-paying one, and it is necessary, in my own interest and that of those who do pay, that I should no longer continue to furnish the AD JANCE to those non-paying subscribers. The second reason is, that I wish to meet the competition of the city weeklies, which are made up from the type of the dailies
