CHAPTER VII. AYS passed uneventfully but for trips to Zell's and then to Zanea's. The canoe was a source of delight to Zell. She learned to use the paddle and passed hours on the water, Terry watching her from the shore. How pleased he was to teach her; if only to paddle.

Zanea knew as much, and more than he did. With her his pleasure lay in listening to her quaint mode of expressing herself. It was like listening to some rare sweet music, pathetic in the extreme. Zell was always joyous as a bird Zanea was at times a little sad; but always pleased to talk with Terry about what she knew thoretically and he knew practically. One day the three were sitting at the foot of the incline. This had become the favorite place for

"Zell, will you sing for us?" "Why, Zanea, I cannot sing. Father Ambrose can, the birdies can, but not Zell. Wait though. Sit back near the rock. There, that will do. Now, you must not speak or move, and we will have some singing.'

She went a short distance from them. Sitting down she clasped her hands around her knee, threw back her head and whistled clear and sweet the oriole's call to its mate, then paused. From away up the mountain an answer came, almost inaudible. Again she whistled the pretty warbling call. This time the answer was nearer. Terry and Zanea looked up, and in the air above them a bright plumaged oriole could be seen circling around and around, lowering at every circle. Lower it came, answering Zell's call as it flew. With fluttering wings it hovered a moment over her, then it lit on her knee, that was caught between her hands. Now Zell broke into a prolonged whistle, a perfect imitation of the oriole's song. Terry had never heard a duet equal to that one, and tears dimmed the dark eyes of Zanea. Full and fuller the bird sang. Clearer and more musical whistled Zell. The bird's throat seemed almost bursting with its load of song. A scream of terror put to flight both bird and music. Zell sprang to her feet, darted to Terry, and clung to him in abject terror, calling to them to save her. Burying her face she pointed backward. "They looked, and there so near, so dangerously near to where Zell had been, lay a large rattle-snake, its tawny body coiled, its head raised about a foot, swaying from side to side, its eyes glistening like black diamonds.

"Terry, Zanea, save me!" "Keep quiet, don't move," he whis pered, "and do not cling to me, let me

"No, no, do not leave me!" In the meantime Zanea had caught her fluttering draperies firmly, and noiselessly as the approach of night she crept toward the reptile. With an electriclike movement she seized the swaying snake just behind the jaws, a swift, strong jerk, and the long writhing body swung over her head. She held the neck, still swinging the body around and around until the motion was very rapid, so rapid that the body remained quite straight. Now against the rock she allowed it to strike with all the strength it had gathered in its rotations. The body hung limply, a slight quiver showed that life was not quite extinguished. Again she swung it, striking it against the rock several times, then dropped it a lifeless, bruised mass, "Poor thing, it was cruel to kill it," was her only comment.

"You are brave, Zanea. Come Zell, the danger is dead. "Oh, Terry, I am so afraid of snakes. Throw it into the Tarn, do. It is the only living thing I am afraid of. Zanea, what can I do for you?" Zanea first threw the dead reptile into the water, then came to poor trembling

"You can teach me to talk to the birds as you do. I do not know why but the birds seem afraid of me, while snakes seem part of myself. It hurt me to kill it even to save you, Zell."

"Were you not afraid to touch it they are so venemous?" asked Terry. "I don't think so. I have been read ing about snakes and learned that to strike the tail proved fatal. I wished to

SHE WAVED IT ALOFT ABOVE HER HEAD chance. It was a beautiful specimen. Come, Zell, you must not look so white. It was nothing. I know its habits or I would have been more frightened than you were; then it was you and your pretty bird its anger was directed at. I was not in danger.'

Zell continued sobbing like a frightened child. Terry leaned against the rock and watched the two, so alike and yet not alike. He thought—they both appeal to my reason for supremacy. What a command of knowledge Zanea has, and she has that ability to put her | Fair open on Sunday. knowledge into practice we so seldom find. What intensity, what independence. I like all these in women. Then what winning dependence, childlike simplicity and alluring coyness Zell has. I like those traits in women equally as well. If Zell were but educated; then fear us. I have a power over animal life wholly magnetic. I know I have this power; I know I can make things do my will. When I think of this power a dull, surging sensation creeps over me and I crave the pleasure of folding something living in my arms and slowly, slowly as does the snake, crush out the life from its pulsing body. I have read of no other animal other than my-

Why do you not do it?" 'There is too much of the woman in

"I do not understand." "I would like to win the man I thought worth winning. He seemed to look into her inmost self, then cruelly indifferent he turned to Zell and asked:

"What would Zell do?" "I do not know what you mean by 'win a man.' Will we go home? I want Shem. Oh, Terry! is Zanea not grand, like the sun. I feel like a cloud that shuts out her warm light. If the wind would only blow me away then the sun could shine as it would like to." Zell knew not how true she had spoken. She was the cloud, without a doubt, through which the glory of Zanea shone but fitfully. Yet clouds are lovely misty necessities.

"Little ethnic, you are a worshipper of the sun, I believe, and you draw queer comparisons." Shem met them and Zell told of the

"Zanea is brave past understanding. She is unique." Hush, Shem; you are too enthusias tic altogether in your praise of a successful experiment. I am hungry; make haste and serve me.' They were soon seated around the table chatting gaily, the incident of the snake quite forgotten. After the sun went down Terry and Zanea started for the cave. He looked forward to those long walks with Zanea. She was mentally all he wished. While with Zell they could not talk of anything out beyond, or of books. Zanea found Terry a severe critic. The moon shone brightly when they gained the platform. Ishmael waited them. He stood with his hands clasped inertly before him, a weary, waiting expression slightly marring the fine face.

"Zanea, thou art late. I feel me strangely weary this night. My power is fitful, and the past will return. "I have been selfish leaving thee long

She drew a seat to the platform and made him sit down. She patted softly the aged cheeks and stroked the silvered hair until the irritation vanished. Terry sat down near them; he always liked to hear these people talk when they were in earnest conversation or deeply moved, for then they used the reverent "thee' and "thou" that sounded so in harmony with the surroundings and the people themselves. Ishmael continued:

spirit leaves this sphere for another? Sit at my feet, while I question thee. Dip deep into the future and tell me what is for thee. Dost thou not love Terry Denver?" "Oh! hush thee, Ishmael; talk not so. Love is not for me. To thee I gave my self till thou or I went hence. Let me

mael and Zanea is short; more, I cannot Give me comfort, Ishmael; I, too, am strangely weary this night." The aged man drew Zanea to him. He had regained his wonted vigor. Close he held her, playfully he petted

"'Tis the first time since childhood Zanea, that thou hast asked for comfort. I thought thee a complete being, but thou, too, art human. Would that I could spare thee this sorrow. Would that I could give thee eternal youth, that in the distant future some one would find thee my priceless jewel, and set thee, a flawless diamond, in that most glorious crown of manhood, his home. Let me cheat old Father Time. I will hide thee, my Zanea, hide all thy glowing beauty 'neath this, the flag of age. Now, when Father Time goes by it will only be an aged face he will find to wither with his furrowing touch, and thou wilt nestle neath thy mantle of snow, a bonnie bud waiting to bloom.

The old man drew his long white hair and beard over the kneeling, drooping girl completely covering her. Terry arose and hurried from this sad scene. Down the hill he strode deep in thought. He paused when half way down the incline, to enjoy the soothing presence of night. A slight sound, in the rock he thought, arrested his attention. Again the sound, this time quite distinct as if a bolt had been drawn. Terry, now thoroughly astonished, saw a large por-tion of what he had supposed solid rock swing back into the mountain, exposing a dimly lit aperature. Two men emerged carrying a canoe. Neither spoke and Terry recognized them as two of the men he had seen in Ishmael's cave. The rock fell to place again and all was dark; but for the light of the moon. He followed the men as they hastened down the hill. Their actions were like those of goaded imbeciles, yet every movement brought the utmost result. The two worked as one man. One object seemed in view, all else sunk into oblivion and nothingness to gain that object. They launched their craft. Not one word did they speak. They stepped into the boat, took the paddles, and silently and swiftly as a cloud scudding before an upper current of air, they sped toward the piers, and disappeared in the darkness. It was more like an
