A PANE OF GLASS.

"I am very sorry, Fred. I had got to like the girl very much, and she has been very faithful to her duties and a good saleswoman and all that, but I cannot permit this pilfering to go on. I think the best way to save her feelings will be just to tell her at the end of the week that we don't require her services any longer, and in that way get rid of her without any direct accusation. You know we took her solely on her own recommendation, without asking for any references—in fact, I'll do her the justice to admit that she frankly told us she could not furnish any, being a stranger in the place.

"But this stealing has been going on for a month now, and as far as we can learn or find out she is the first one here in the morning and is here alone long enough to give her an opportunity to help herself. Another thing I have noticed, and that is that she has had several little trinkets lately which seem to me decidedly more extravagant than a girl of her means could afford to indulge in, unless she has come by them through such means as I begin to fear she is guilty of."

Fred but his lip and was silent. It would not have helped the case at all for him to have told his father just then that he knew the source from whence she had derived those little gifts, which he had contrived to convey to her in such a way that she would not be able to detect the giver and so return them to him which it had afforded him such delight to see her wear, little dreaming at the time that they would only serve as additional means of strengthening suspicion against her.

"I had been only waiting a favorable opportunity to speak to her of his feelings and assure himself of her sentiments, before telling his father of the hopes he had been cherishing, but before that opportunity arrived this unexpected trouble and threatened disgrace had cast a shadow over the fair name of the girl he secretly loved. "I'll stake my life, father, that she hasn't a trinket about her but what is honestly come by," he exclaimed, after a moment's embarrassed silence, and that she is a thoroughly honest and trustworthy girl. Don't discharge her this week father. Give her—give me one week more, and let me see if I can't discover the thief. I promise that if I find it is indeed she I will not try to shield her. But let me have that much time to try to discover the real culprit."

"I don't see how you are going to do it," replied Mr. Adams, looking around the apartment. "There is no way that I can see but of getting here ahead of the thief, whoever it is—and, of course, the money will not be taken with you looting on, and there is no way to conceal yourself in the room here. You know I have been accustomed to leave money in that drawer, for the convenience of giving change if it should be needed, before I get down in the morning, and nobody knows but you that I am in the habit of counting it every night before leaving, and that for the last month it has not balanced with the cashier's account, but constantly shows a deficiency. It must be taken in the morning, before we get here, and Miss Allen is, as she has said herself, the first one here—indeed she has a key of her own, so that she can get in as early as she pleases."

Fred's eyes had been roving around the room while his father was speaking. There was, as he said, no possible chance of his concealing himself anywhere in the room without making the fact of that concealment evident and thus defeating his purpose, but as he glanced over at the opposite side of the room near the window, and in one drawer of which was kept the money for such miscellaneous expenses as postage, telegrams and other incidental small expenditures, and from which sums that could not be accounted for had been missing for a month past, his face lightened. The window faced another window of a large building, the side of which was separated only by a narrow court and which was for the time vacant, and a suggestion occurred to him which he seized upon at once.

"I'll admit it does look black against her, father," he said. "But I believe I can find a way in a week's time either to vindicate her or prove that your suspicions are just, though I believe that it will vindicate her. Just let me have one more week and if I don't discover the culprit by that time I will make no further plea."

"All right, my boy," said Mr. Adams, smiling and perhaps not altogether without an intuition as to the cause of his son's earnestness. "I can stand the loss of a few pounds more, I guess. Find the culprit and you can name your own reward."

"I don't desire any reward," replied Fred. But his troubled face told another story, and one that his father was not slow to detect. Not only Margery Allen, but the three other girls in the employ of Mr. Adams' photographic establishment missed the frank, bright smile and pleasant word which his son had been wont to greet them, and into Margery's pretty eyes crept a look of hurt surprise mingled with a deeper feeling that went to Fred's very heart. But he maintained his demeanor unshaken, meanwhile studying each face and act of the girls with a scrutiny he had never bestowed upon them before, and his night he had pretty well settled in his own mind as to the culprit, but to make that suspicion a certainty was the task that remained.

If any of the girls in passing near the window where the desk stood had chanced to glance at the building opposite, they might have noticed that it had been provided with a shade, with the exception of one pane of glass, where the shade had been cut away. But they either did not notice it or did not think it of sufficient consequence to mention "if they did, and the next day's work went on as usual except that Margery remarked to herself, with a little faster beating of the heart, that it was the first day since her finding the employment that had been to her such a boon that Fred's eyes had failed to meet hers with an encouraging or friendly smile, in which of late she had imagined she could detect a warmer sentiment.

The next morning the girls were at their work as usual when Mr. Adams and his son entered the establishment. Both gentlemen looked serious, but on Fred's face was also clearly manifested a look of triumphant satisfaction. "Young ladies," said Mr. Adams, addressing his employees, "I have rather an unpleasant subject to introduce this morning, but it is not of my choosing, and would prefer to give you an opportunity to acknowledge your act than to charge you with it. Which of you is first here in the morning?"

"I believe I am, sir," answered Margery, to which the others assented. "Well, I am sorry to report that for some time past I have been missing small sums of money from the drawer where I keep the change for incidental expenses, and to which you have all access as occasion requires. Now, I will put it to you formally, Miss Allen, do you know anything in regard to the missing money?"

"I do not, sir," she replied, lifting her eyes to his face with a look of perfect innocence and truthfulness, while Fred in his delight and joy could scarce restrain himself from hugging her on the spot. "Miss Wilson, do you?—or you, Miss Douglas?—or you, Miss Ferris?"

A most emphatic denial was the unanimous response. "Well," said Mr. Adams, "it seems that we must resort to some other means to ascertain the culprit. What have you to say, Fred?"

"Merely to ask the young ladies if any of them recognize any one they know in this," responded Fred, drawing out a small plate and laying it before them. There was an excellent photograph of the interior of the room, and bending over the open drawer of the desk in the act of taking some silver from it was the unmistakable profile, face and figure of Lottie Wilson.

With a startled cry she drew back, covering her burning face with her hands. "If you will tell me the whole story, I will let you off with no greater punishment than being discharged from my service," said Mr. Adams sternly. "Otherwise I shall call an officer and hand you over to him forthwith."

Overcome with terror at this threat, Lottie sobbingly confessed that she had been the thief, having coaxed the house-keeper to let her in on the plea that she wanted to get to work early, and then slipping out again and not returning until after Margery had arrived, so that if the thief was discovered suspicion would fall on her. Mr. Adams heard her to the end, then, quietly requested her to get her hat and cloak attended her to the door and bowed her out. Then returning to Margery, who was standing a little apart from the rest he said in a tone of more than wonted kindness:

"There is a little story connected with this discovery which there is not a fitting opportunity to tell here, but if you will allow my son to escort you to my house this evening to dinner I will be happy to make you acquainted with my wife, and you can hear the sequel of this affair."

Margery bowed, too happy to speak after one eloquent look from Fred's eyes, and went back to her duties with a heart bounding high. At the appointed hour Fred accompanied her to his home where, after being introduced to his mother, who took the orphan girl to her heart and embrace at once, they told her the story. "The moment I looked at that window of the building opposite," Fred said in conclusion, "it occurred to me that I might make use of it as a point not only of observation, but from which I could obtain a view of the place and the culprit. By investigating and experimenting I found that I could photograph the room accurately. And I had a shade put up, leaving only one pane of glass exposed, in front of which I could place my machine and do the work without being seen in return. I was there this morning by daylight, arranged my apparatus, and about half an hour before your coming the door opened and Lottie Wilson came in. I waited until she was in the very act of taking the money, as you see, and then secured my snap shot that vindicated you, my darling, and has made me the happiest man alive—all by the aid of that blessed pane of glass."

He had not intended to make his avowal of love in such a fashion, but his joy and affection burst from him simultaneously, and the next moment he had her in his rapturous embrace, from which she made no effort to disengage herself. "Goodby, my dear daughter," Mrs. Adams whispered as she bade her goodby before resigning her to Fred's care to escort her home. "You shall be my daughter in a very few weeks if I have anything to say about it."

And that she not only had considerable to say about it, but said it, was evinced by the modest but delightful little wedding that took place not long after, at which Fred and Margery were the principal parties interested, and if their faces were any indication the very happiest people that could be found anywhere.—London Tit-Bits.

HEART FAILURE, FAINTNESS, ACUTE DYSPEPSIA, with Complete Nervous Prostration, Cured by Using HAWKER'S NERVE & STOMACH TONIC.

A LADY'S EXPERIENCE. Mr. Wm. Thompson of Moncton, N. B., says: "For 2 years past my wife has suffered with Acute Dyspepsia accompanied with complete nervous prostration and a smothering sensation about the heart which frequently produced an attack of faintness. She became weak and nervous, lost all energy, and had a constant feeling of dread. She suffered with intercostal pain in the stomach after eating, which was usually followed by the vomiting. She tried a great many remedies and was treated by the doctors for some time, but obtained no relief. She became so discouraged that she gave up all hope of ever getting better, when she read in the Standard of the HAWKER'S NERVE & STOMACH TONIC and LIVER PILLS in several cases of remarkable cures after taking the second dose, and she continued to improve ever since until today she is as well as ever, and can enjoy her food without fear and suffering. I cannot speak too highly of these valuable medicines which have restored my wife to health and strength, and saved much suffering and expense."

Rev. Henry M. Seike, Rector of Moncton, N. B., says: "I am personally acquainted with Mrs. Thompson's case, and am greatly pleased that the medicine which I recommended to her produced such remarkable results."
