ANDRE'S LOVE.

Are some men fated by the stars, as Napoleon Bonaparte believed?
In ancient times it was almost universally held that the stars in their courses fought against or for men. We have given up such notions nowadays as superstitious, and yet sometimes, when one sees earnest and gifted men struggling in vain against adverse circumstances, while others, without a struggle, without an effort, are borne triumphantly upon the tide of happiness and success, one is apt to give credence to the old idea of astral influence and exclaim, "The stars are against us!"

Such a person is said to have been born under an evil star. Was Major Andre a man of that description? Let the reader judge.
Up to the age of manhood everything seemed to go well with him.
Handsome, gifted beyond the common run of men blessed with the power to win hearts and to please, the world appeared like a table of delights before him. His father was a prosperous Genoese merchant settled in London, and John was educated in the famous city with a view to following a mercantile career. At the age of 20 he returned to his home, the intention being that he should join the elder Andre in business. But parental fondness still indulged him. John Andre had not seen much of his native land, and being fond of travel and study he was allowed to make a tour of England, his father feeling that the knowledge thus gained would redound to his son's subsequent success in business.

In the course of his travels the young man came to Lichfield and was there introduced to the circle of Miss Seward, famous in her day as a writer and poet. Among the persons whom he met at her house was the fair Honora Sneyd, a young lady a few years younger than himself, beautiful beyond any woman he had ever seen before and dowered with the fatal gift of genius. No sooner had he set eyes upon this young lady than he fell deeply in love with her.

Miss Sneyd was not insensible to the attentions he paid her nor to the charms of his person and accomplishments. Not only did he play divinely on the harpsichord, but he had a good voice and was frequently induced to take part with Honora in a duet. One evening he was induced to sing a song of his own composition. It breathed the tenderest sentiments of love and was greatly admired.

A little later, in a stroll with him round the garden with its daintily trimmed parterres, its boxes of woodbine and roses and its lurking cupids in shady bowers, Honora ventured to pass warm encomiums upon his ditty.
"Will you accept it, Miss Sneyd?" said Andre. "I mean," he added, "will you accept its dedication?" Honora hesitated.

"It was written and composed expressly for you," he added looking down upon her in rapture.

The moon was shining brightly, the garden was full of fragrance, and a nightingale was warbling his love notes to the summer night.
The very air, soft and balmy, seemed an incentive to love.
"You do not answer, Miss Sneyd," Andre continued.

"You do me too much honor, Mr. Andre," Honora replied.
"That were impossible," the young man returned in an impassioned voice.

"Will you take me in, Mr. Andre?
I think it is time we returned." "If you desire it, but—"

In short, though they did return to the house in the course of a few minutes, it was not until Andre had declared his passion and Honora, confessing her own tender love, had promised to be his wife.

As they ascended the steps into the house they were met by Mr.
Lovell Edgeworth, a gentleman who had for some time been paying his addresses to Honora. He was no longer in the flower of youth, having already buried one wife, but he was both educated and well to do, and his suit was regarded with favor by Honora's parents.

"Shall I take you to your father, Miss Sneyd?" asked Mr. Edgeworth. "He has been looking for you."

"Thank you," replied the young lady, taking his arm and giving Andre a full look of love.

Mr. Edgeworth had for some time noticed and been annoyed by Andre's attentions to Miss Sneyd, and fearing from their long stay in the garden that he hastened to inform Mr. Sneyd of what had occurred.

In the morning as early as propriety would permit, Mr. Andre called to see Mr. Sneyd. That gentleman was engaged for the moment, and while he was waiting Honora entered.

"Ah, I did not expect this pleasure, darling!" exclaimed Andre.
"Nor did I, but I thought I had better see you, for I fear there is trouble."

"Why?" asked the young man.
"From something that was said at breakfast time."

"But you do not regret your promise given to me last night, dearest?"

"No, nor ever shall, whatever comes."
"God bless you, darling!"
They had barely time to seal their words with a kiss ere Mr.
Sneyd entered. He appeared angry at seeing them together and bade Honora leave the room.

When alone, Mr. Sneyd said he understood that his visitor had been paying very marked attentions to his daughter.

Andre bowed, replied that it was true, and that it was that matter which had brought him there.

Mr. Sneyd at once became very wroth and said that if his visitor had had the good feeling to make known his intentions before he would have saved him a deal of trouble. He then proceeded to inform Andre that he had already promised his daughter to another, and that in any case he should not have allowed her to marry into trade.

The young man remonstrated, implored, but in vain. Mr. Sneyd was obdurate, and in the end showed him to the door, refusing even to allow him a word of farewell to Honora.

Maddened, crushed, insulted, Andre lingered in Lichfield for several days, hoping to see and get a word with his beloved, but to no purpose.

His friend, Miss Seward, advised him to continue his travels and leave the result to time. Andre was not indisposed to follow her counsel, but still lingered for a day or two. Finally one evening as he was entering the town after a long walk a carriage and pair dashed passed him in the gathering gloom.
As it did so he caught sight of a fair face at the window, heard the word "farewell" and felt something drop at his feet.

It was a rose—Honora's last gift to him.

The carriage went in the direction of London.
There was now nothing to keep Andre in Lichfield, and next day he returned home. It was to find things in a very sad way there.
His father, his only remaining parent, had been suddenly stricken down with fever, and his life was despaired of. The good man rallied for a time, but finally passed away three days after his son's return.

This second stroke of fortune was hardly less terrible than the first, for young Andre had loved his father very dearly. But he had not much time to devote to grief. With his father's affairs to put in order and the business to attend to he had his hands quite full. Still, busy as he was and full as his mind was of other things, the image of Honora was ever in his thoughts.

Finally, when things were somewhat straightened, he returned to Lichfield bent upon forcing an interview with Honora's father.
Miss Seward, whose guest he was, advised him against the attempt at present and pointed out that Mr.
Sneyd had an invincible objection to trade, adding:

"But time and his undoubted love for his daughter may overcome that."

The result of the conversation was the birth of a resolution in Andre's mind which he at once proceeded to carry out—which was to quit trade forever. At that time war was raging between England and her revolted North American provinces, and he resolved to purchase a commission and see what active service would do to cure his melancholy.

He joined the British army towards the end of 1775 and was shortly afterward taken prisoner by a party of Indians. Carried away into the woods and kept under close surveillance, he was otherwise treated with kindness. The report got abroad, however, that he was killed, and in the course of time—for communications were then very slow—the news reached England.

Honora, to whom the tidings were communicated, wept and bemoaned her lover's sad fate, and it was long before she could be comforted.

All this time her parents had been imploring her to complete their happiness by consenting to marry Mr. Edgeworth. They seemed sincerely desirous of promoting her happiness, and as her beloved was now in the grave she agreed after the elapse of some months to comply.

The wedding day came in due course. No one could see happier than the bridegroom and Mr. and Mrs. Sneyd when the ceremony had been performed. Honora, too, tried to look cheerful, if she could not feel happy. But she retired to her room to put on her travelling dress with a heavy heart. Upon her dressing table she found a letter, placed there by one of the servants.
It was from Andre and was full of expressions of love and devotion.

The poor bride summoned up courage enough to put the letter away, to wipe her eyes and to go down and try to smile as they drove away amid the plaudits of the wedding guests. But from that day her heart was dead within her.

Meanwhile Andre had been promoted to the rank of major and appointed adjutant general to Sir Henry Clinton, commander in chief of the British forces. But every step he took seemed to be fraught with fresh disaster.

His position as Clinton's chief confidant brought Andre into connection with General Arnold, who was plotting the betrayal of West Point—the key of the rebel position—to the British. He carried on the correspondence with Arnold, which was disguised under color of a mercantile transaction. Andre adopted the name of John Anderson, and Arnold signed himself Gustavus.

When on Sept. 20 the negotiations were sufficiently advanced, Andre proceeded up the Hudson river in the British sloop Vulture to hold a personal interview with Arnold. In order to avoid treatment as a spy he wore his uniform and professed to be endeavoring to bring about an arrangement in respect to the sequestered property of an American loyalist. His letter to Arnold on the subject having been shown by the latter to Washington, the American commander in chief so strongly protested against an interview between the two that Arnold was compeled to resort to a secret meeting which took place on the night of Sept. 21.

Arnold then delivered to Andre full particulars respecting the defences of West Point and concerted with him the attack which the British were to make within a few days.

Meanwhile the Vulture had been compelled by the fire of the American outposts to drop further down the river and when Andre wished to return on board his boatmen refused to row him back. He was accordingly obliged to spend the day at the farmhouse of a man named Joshua Smith, who is represented by some as a tool of Arnold's and by some as an accomplice.

Such was Andre's position now that he had no alternative but to disguise himself as a civilian, which, as he was now inside the American lines, brought him within reach of military law as a spy. He started early next morning with a pass in the name of "Anderson," signed by General Arnold, under the guidance of Smith, who only left him when he seemed past all danger. By 9 o'clock on the morning of Sept. 23 he was seized by three American cowboys on the look out for plunder.

Searched for valuables, the compromising papers were found in his boots. He offered the men a large reward for his release; but they, thinking they might get more for delivering him up, refused his bribe and carried him before the coman-der of the outposts.

But what need to enter into details? The papers found upon him only too fatally declared the nature of his mission. Every effort was made by Sir Henry Clinton to save him, but in vain. He was tried by court martial and sentenced to be shot as a spy, and on Oct. 2, at Tophen, in the state of New York, the extreme penalty of the law was carried out.

A sadder tragedy was perhaps never enacted, and yet it has been universally acknowledged that no reproach in connection with the affair rests upon any person concerned except Arnold, who, traitor though he was, lived to reap honors and rewards.

In conclusion, let it be stated that his countrymen honored him by a monument in Westminster abbey, and his friend, Miss Seward by an eloquent monody on his life and genius, and recently the descendants of the people who killed him have removed his ashes from the abbey for interment in American soil.—Million.
