MEXICO'S BIG LOCOMOTIVE. A Double-Ender of 130 Tons Weight to Climb Tropical Mountains. The biggest and most powerful railroad locomotive in the world, according to Locomotive Engineering for January, will soon be running on the Mexican Central railroad. It was constructed at the Rhode railroad. It was constructed at the Rhode Island locomotive works, with a couple of like companions. The monster weighs 130 tons when in working order and was built to climb steep grades in the mountains of Mexico and to drag heavy loads around sharp curves safely.

The engine looks like a couple of locomotives of the "mogul" pattern backed up together, with the two cabs joined. It is an odd form, and was constructed after a together, with the two cabs joined. It is an odd form, and was constructed after a design by Superintendent of Machinery F. W. Johnstone of the Mexican Central, who realized that a special style was necessary for the work to be performed on his railroad. The idea was to secure a motor with flexibility sufficient to go round the harmonymes with least frictional resistance. sharp curves with least frictional resistance.

This flexibility is gained by securing the driving wheels in a truck which is free to move in a line different from that followed by the main frames. The cylinder and boiler in the Mexican frames separate from the driving-wheel truck. As the cylinders are not in line with the driving wheels in rounding curves it is necessary that a special method of transmitting power from the cylinders to the crank pins should be employed. This is done in a very ingenious we, through levers that transmit the power and compensate for the varying distances between the piston and the crank, due to the swiveling of the driving wheels. But for this com pensating arrangement it would be neces sary to give the engine so much cylinder clearance that the loss of steam would be very great. The power-transmitting levers are seen at the back of the cylinders, conwith a return crank. The piston transmits motion to the back one of the two levers, and that gives motion to the front lever, which is fulcrumed securely to the frame near its center. The engines are compound, with annular cylinders, the high-pressure cylinder being in the middle and the low pressure cylinder outside. The high-pressare cylinder is 13 inches in diameter and the low pressure 28 inches. The stroke is 24 inches. It is
