

When the ladies had withdrawn Mr. Butfield seemed more cheerful than might have been expected of a tradesman who had just learned of so severe a loss. He despatched a note to Captaiu Heaton, informing him of the event of the afternoon, and concluding with the statement that in his opinion now was the time to put the screw on. Mr. Butterfield did a rather extensive and peculiar business. He had already twice disposed of the jewellery he had sold to Harry Wynne, and having in each case parted with it to a wealthy and inexperienced young gentleman, and in each case repurchased it from the Delilah to whom repurchased it from the Delilah to whom the wealthy and inexperienced young gen-tleman had presented it, he now felt him-self on velvet. His terms for selling and his terms for buying were naturally very different, and he had the satisfaction of knowing that whatever came out of the latest transaction came as pure profit. The wealthy and inexperienced young gentle-men who had already owned the ornaments were, like their successor, proteges of the good Captain Heaton, whose introduction to expensive tradesmen was often at the service of the gilded youth, his friends.

Lady McCorquodale and Mrs. Brotherick drove straight to Eccleston Square, and were set down at the house of Lord Hounes. His lordship was at home and received her ladyship without a moment's delay. The horrible story was told, with interjectory denunciations and uplifting of the hrnds. Surely such a prodigal orphan had never hitherto been heard of in the history of the world. The trio of indignation rose sour and shrill, and the three vied with each and shrill, and the three vied with each other in condemnation of the young man's heartlessness; his infidelity, his fidelity, and all he had done and would not do. When they had done with him the common carrion crow of scandal might have declined to pick at his disfigured carcase. There is nobody who can malign a youthful wrongdoer like the elders of his own blood. His lordship, who was not an active man as a rule, was for prompt and vigorous ac-as a rule, was for prompt and vigorous action. The confidential old family butler was sent for and despatched to Mr. Fergusson's office in the city in Lady McCorquodale's own carriage, with instructions to return immediately with Mr. Wynne. Pending the young man's arrival they slew his thrice-stain character again and again, and by the time he came they were in such a state of solemn, wrathful awe at his wickedness as they could find no words for. Lord Hounes, as representing most nearly the family sublime head, took the peccant youthin hand. He stood upon the heart hrug, with one hand beneath his coat-tails and the other thrust into his waistcoat, in that attitude of natural dignity he had been wont to assume before his constituents, and in the House. The ladies, in their out-of-door at live, sat at either side of him.

"Young man," said Lord Hounes, "we have sent for you in order to give you an immediate opportunity of explaining a transaction which bears upon its face indisputable evidences of the blackest turpitude." "In that case," the criminal returned, "it may be hardly worth explaining. Your lordship was good enough not to know me when last we met. I thought it possible that you might have wished to make an

At this daring speech, which indicated a wickedness beyond his years, Mrs. Brotherick shuddered violently, and became rigid.

Her ladyship flounced in her chair, and gave vent to an inarticulate note of contempt and anger. Lord Hounes withdrew the hand which had rested on his waistcoat, and magnificently waved the accused to "Your insolence," he said, "can serve no object. It is useless to say that it may exacerbate the wound you have already in-flicted upon the family feeling and the family character and the family pride, a feeling, a character, and a pride, sir, which are not accustomed to be dragged through the humiliating dust of base intrigue, Harry relieved him from a dilemma, for his lordship positively saw no fitting close to his period. "I beg your pardon, sir. Will you be s good as to tell me what I have done? I may be better able to accept your denunci ations afterwards."

The young man was sore against his titled relative, and thought he had a right to be. Lord Hounes had publicly insulted him, without a cause that he himself could trace and the boy had no more idea of the meaning of his lordship's oratorical greeting than the man in the moon might have had.

"Lady McCorquodale," said his lordship, suppressing himself by an heroic effort,

"has just returned here from the shop of Mr. Butterfield, a jeweller, in Conduit Street." The criminal turned a little white at this, and winced. He had thought it punishment enough for his past reckless-ness that he should have to pay something like a thousand pounds for a year or two's interest on three hundred, and he had not counted on the humiliation of discovery It was bad enough to know that he had been a fool, and that he had so heavily crippled his own resources. "She had learned there," pursued his lordship, "that you are infamously in debt there, and that the objects you purchased there could have but one destination. You pretend, sir, to aspire to the hand of an innocent and charming young lady; you persist with a degrading selfishness in standing in that young lady's way to wealth and an honourable position; you profess yourself to be animated by a lofty and Quixotic attachment and in the same hour with all this eyes of your family and of the world."

"That is absolutely untrue, sir," Harry "Untrue!" thundered his lordship. "Lady McCorquodale and Mrs. Brotherick have with their own eyes beheld the evidence of your infamy.

The young man's blood boiled, but he re-strained himself, and indeed the thought that they were stabbing at him through Inthia so sickened him a moment later that he had need rather to spur than to control himself. For a mere instant the thought assailed him that the construction Lord Hounes put upon his purpose was manufactured for the family uses, but he himself was too natively just-minded to hold that suspicion long. He had to admit that the charge looked probable.

"May I ask your lordship," he said, "to employ a little moderation? Will you do me the bare justice to tell me of what you "Do me the favor then," returned his lordship, "to respond categorically to my enquiries. Are you, or are you not, indebted to Mr. Butterfield?" "I am indebted," Harry answered, "to Mr. Butterfield in the sum of two thousand three hundred pounds. I have a constant assurance that he will willingly wait two years for the money, and in that time I expect to be able to pay him."

"Indeed!" rejoined his lordship, with a sneer, which set Harry's blood racing and boiling again. "And now you will tell me with what other object than to pander to your own vices you made that extravagant purchase! For whom did you buy those "I bought them for myself," he answered desperately.

His lordship and Lady McCorquodale broke into a scornful laugh at this. "You expect us to believe that?" her ladyship asked. "I expect to be believed in whatever I may say. I have a right to expect to be believed." "To whom did you give those jewels?" her ladyship asked. She was disposed to be directer in her inquiries than her brother. "You may as well tell us the creature's name at once, and put an end to this disgraceful "This," said the boy desperately, "is a private matter of my own. I have given no man the right to hold such language as Lord Hounes has used to me. If it concerns you to know that I bought the jewels I have owned the fact already. When I fail honourably to pay for them I will submit to anything you may choose to say to

This was all very well in its way, and he was conscious of enough right on his side to allow him to be angry and disdainful at the charges brought against him, but the thought of Inthia came again. They would tell her this wicked story, and would do their best to make her believe it. That cooled his courage, and he went on in an-

"To whom did you present them?"
"I presented them to nobody." "Then you have them now?" "No. They are no longer in my hands." "Where are they?"
"That, with all due regard to your lady-

"Very well," her ladyship responded, rising and drawing her furs about her. "You understand, Mr. Wynne, that Inthia is my ward. I shall permit you to hold no further intercourse with her, and I desire that in future you will not address me or claim acquaintanceship in any way."

that you don't know what you've done?"

"Now," said young Wynne, lifting his eyes and looking squarely at the captain's face, "to tell you the truth, Heaton, I had enough of that sort of thing yesterday to satisfy me for the rest of my life. If I have done anything, be good enough to tell me at once what it is. If it concerns you in any way I will give you whatever explanation you may have a right to."

"If he has done anything!" repeated the captain, as if appealing to some invisible third person who knew all about it and was beund to share his own friendly sorrow.

"Be good enough," interjected his lordship, "to consider our knowledge of each other at an end. pushed, that hope is, and will remain, illusory."

After this there was nothing left but to go, with whatever dignity was possible, and the Pariah, thus solemnly ejected from the family circle, went away without a word.

CHAPTER VI.

Four or five hours had gone by before he could properly be said to think of anything. He walked unconsciously straight back to his chambers, and sat there in his gloves and hat, sternly surveying a wild whirl of inconsequent and incongruous fancies. He was like one dazed by a heavy blow on the head, too stunned to feel his own pain. It occurred to him often to think that he took things very easily, and once he said, with Hamlet, that he was pigeon-livered, and lacked gall to make oppression bitter. He could not even find energy to be angry at the epithets Lord Hounes had hurled upon him, nor even—stranger still—to care greatly about Inthisic wounded heart when the course of the property of the young man answered. Captain Heaton threw the theme clean away with both hands, and looked mournfully resigned.

"You—you don't know? You—you don't know? You—you don't know? Hou—you don't know? Hou—you don't know? You—you don't know? Hou—you don't know? You—you don't know? Hou—you don't know? You—you don't know? Hou—you don't know? You—you don't know? You—you don't know? You—you don't know? Hou—you don't kn

the epithets Lord Hounes had hurled upon him, nor even — stranger still — to care greatly about Inthia's wounded heart when she should hear the calumny. Bit by bit the pain sharpened, the stunned feeling cleared away, and his mind got to work again. He began to think it inevitable that on the evidence against him Inthia must believe him guilty. He told himself that nothing in the world should persuade him that she was unfaithful to him in a thought, and out of his own lovalty he thought, and out of his own loyalty he thought, and out of his own loyalty he brewed a cordial, warm and spiced enough to cheer his failing heart a little. Its effect was transitory; the evidence against him was too strong. What could she do but believe that which everybody about her believed? He was forbidden her presence, and he knew how, with the exception of Inthia, everybody hailed his seeming downfall. They would press Humphrey Frost and his millions upon her now, and perhaps. and his millions upon her now, and perhaps, in the sore desperation of her heart, she might accept him. He prowled up and down his room like a beast in pain. It is hard to be young and alive from head to heel, and to be thus fettered by the impos-sibilities, to stand behind invisible bars beyond which there is no passage, and to see the soul's desire borne, passionately weeping, away. His own impotence writhed in him, like a twisted arrow in a wound. He was helpless, helpless! He could

Yes. One thing at least he could do. He could write to Inthia and tell her the whole truth from first to last. It was humiliating, but by contrast with the lie the truth looked heavenly bright. He had been to blame, foolishly, wickedly to blame, but he was no inmate of the sty where Lady McCorquodale's fancy saw him, the vile place Inthia was to be told of as his natural habitat. True to her! How could he be otherwise than true to her ?--all purity, truth and goodness as she was. Could it were the most ordinary transaction in he leave the innocent tenderness of her eyes and the sweet welcome of her hands?
That was a physical repulsion, a nauseating sickness, in his fancy. He was faithful to her to the core; so faithful that fidelity was not a virtue to him. Inthia meant the sex, and outside and be- law. You have laid yourself open to arrest

He gave a little mirthless chuckle at the discovery, and removed them. Then he sat down, and began to write. He filled sheet after sheet with wild protestations of truth and love, and when he had tions of truth and love, and when he had finished the letter, behold it meant nothing to his mind. All the blood and passion, all the heat and fervor, seemed to have stopped short at his finger-tips. Not a tone of the wild kaleidoscopic splendors of his heart had touched the paper. It stared, blank, cold, and meaningless. He tore it across and across and threw it into the fire-grate, and began anew with the same chilling recommendation. The twinge. Heaton poured out a glass of brandy and pushed it over to him.

"Drink that," he said, "and pull yourself together. My poor boy! why the dickens didn't you come to me? I'd have pawned my last shirt rather than see you in a mess like this. Why didn't you ask somebody? Any man of the world would have told you." and began anew, with the same chilling result. He did not know how the night went by, but the noise of the fretful wind and the plash of the mournful rain outside were part of him. Many and many a time afterwards the noises of the stormy night brought back that time so vividly that his heart ached at them with the memory of its own old pain. At length, when he seemed to have cast all the scoriæ out of his heart and brain, his thoughts ran clear. He wrote a letter, brief and lucid, in which he told, as well and clearly as another knowing all the cir-cumstances could have told it for him, the story of his entanglement. He did not spare his own foolishness, but he closed with a humble hope that it was over, and that his lesson would last him for his life-

He looked up, and lo! the day had dawned outside already. He drew up one of the blinds, and looked out upon the of the blinds, and looked out upon the street. threw himself upon the sofa, and in a while fell stupidly asleep. The entrance of the house porter with broom and dustpan failed to awake him, but on the man's return with breakfast and letters he made a judicious clatter, and Harry came out of his dreams. He looked at the letters wearily as they lay upon the table, and turned them over with negligent fingers, until he caught sight of Inthia's writing. A great shock went through him, and he knew that he held the news of his fate in his own hands. He tore the envelope open, and the first line he read assured him, and shot warm conviction of safety through him from head to heel. "My Dearcst Harry,—I do not believe a word of the wicked and shameful story that Lady McCorquodale has told me. She says that we are not to meet again, but that will make no difference to me, and I am sure that it will make no difference in you. You must be brave, dear, and hope and have patience. I dare not wait to write more. -Yours ALWAYS.

"INTHIA." He kissed that brave message a hundred times, and hugged it, and kissed it again. Oh! the honest, loyal heart; the peerless creature! In spite of fog, rain, smoke, and wind, the wide world beamed with sunshine. He dashed rejoicingly into his bedroom, tore off his raiment with rollicking scraps of song plunged into his tub, and emerged from it like a radiant young giant. He dressed, and sat down to breakfast in an exquisite complacency. His inner man reminded him now that he had forgotten to dine the day before. He rang for more eggs, and a further supply of devilled kidney, and made an exuberant meal. What did he care about Lord Hounes and Lady McCorquodale and Mrs. Brotherick now? Their suspicions had no longer power to vex him. He sang that the whole family syndicate might go to Hong Kong, might go to Hong Kong, might go to Hong Kong for him. You would have been hard put to it to find a happier young man in London.

In this joyful mood he was preparing for his daily journey to the city, when the house porter brought him a letter addressed in a hand unknown to him. The messenger who had brought it was instructed to wait for a response. Harry glanced first at the signature, and found that the missive came "My dear boy," it ran, "for Heaven's sake come round to me at once. Do not lose a moment. It is a matter of the most urgent consequence to yourself.' Wondering what this might mean, Harry marched off in front of the messenger, and in three minutes from his receipt of the letter found himself in Captain Heaton's presence. The morning plumage of the worthy captain was gay and brilliant. He was in a gorgeously flowered and embroidered dressing-gown, and wore Turkish slippers and a scarlet fez. He had begun his day's work early, and was already engaged over a brandy and soda and a cigar. In the evening, all things considered, Captain Heaton was a youngish-looking man for his years,
