THE CZAR'S DOMAIN

How It is Represented at the Exposition.

SURPRISES THAT ARE DELIGHTFUL.

Marvelous Beauty of the Enamels of the Boyars—An Art of the Ancients Revived by the Russians—Statues and Busts of Emperors Which Run Throughout an Russian Work at the Exposition.

WORLD'S FAIR, July 22. [Special.]—One of the most delightful surprises of this exposition is Russia. Few of us expected much from her. We had fallen into the mental habit of viewing the czar's vast kingdom as a semi-barbaric region where a few feudal lords rule many millions of serfs. We could not get out of our mind the notion that Russia is wild, rude, unenlightened, barbaric. So we have approached the Russian pavilion in Manufactures building with a feeling that duty and curiosity are driving us to spend a few moments inspecting the back-country exhibits of the steppes of eastern Europe. Imagine our surprise when we find the Boyars outstripping all competitors in some lines of manufacture which require the highest form of art and skill.

You can tell the Russian pavilion as far as you can see it down the great Columbian avenue. No flag, no imperial crest, no sign-board is necessary to enable you to determine where Belgium leaves off on the one side and Norway on the other. Russia's pavilion is characteristic. It marks Russia in every line of its dark timbers, left in natural color, in every form used in the strong, angular architecture. One beauty of Russia's display here is that everything is done in wood. The Russians are a people to themselves, their art, their architecture, their designs, their methods, are things apart from the remainder of Christendom. The pavilion dates nearly three centuries back. It is catholic-like. One corner has a great-vaulted, where you see examples of ceiling and wall decorations in vogue in the Greek church. Along the entire front of the pavilion runs a broad platform, decorated with arms and vases of heavy marble and other hard stones from the exalted mines in Siberia.

Passing within, one is drawn by some fascination to the huge cases in which the silverwares of Moscow and St. Petersburg present the first of the delightful surprises which we are to encounter here. It is the enamel work. We think we have seen enamel work in the Belgian section, in the Italian, the Austrian and elsewhere. But till we see the enamels of the Boyars we do not know what enamel is, we have no conception of the marvelous beauty of the effects that may be wrought by this most difficult process.

Here we learn, moreover, that to the Russian is not given the credit of reviving an art with the ancients. Then for ages it is the enamel work. The Russians arrived it, developed it, and it must be admitted have perfected it.

I regret my inability to describe the beauty of the enamel for you, but the prices will in a measure serve to give you a hint. Prices do not always do justice, for it is as easy to say five thousand dollars as it is to make it so. The enamel work here who exercise a great deal of license in this respect. But the Russians, so the experts say, have not done this. Their prices are a true valuation, but stand near and examine the exquisite character of the blue decorations.

The value of these articles consists not of their material but of the workmanship. Silver is cheap, and enamel competition is not costly. Neither is gilt. But the melted enamel composition must be poured with ten thousand deft, merging together. One blunder and the whole fabric will be destroyed. This explains why this little jewel casket is worth $60; why a clear case of earl case is worth $85; why a toilet set of eight pieces and two vases to match is held at $4,100; why souvenir spoons are valued from $20 to $100 each; why a little vase that you could hold in your hand is worth $50; why an inkstand with enamel silver tea and coffee service is priced at $3,275. These are large figures, but the value is there. The Russians are not here to make big profits. They have felt so grateful for America's assistance during their famine period that they have spent much money in making a show here that would contrive to glorify in the glory of the exposition. Less than one-half foreign nation are they hungry for American dollars.

There are several notable pieces here. One is a magnificent medallion, framed in carved oxidized silver, which was presented to the czarowitz by his regiment of Ural cossacks in commemoration of their crossing the Danube in the Russian Turkish war of 1878. The picture in the medallion, exquisitely engraved, would be ample proof of the skill of the Russians in this art even if there were not many other examples at hand. It shows the czarowitz and his staff crossing the blue Danube in pontoon boats, and with a low relief there is deep perspective and perfect shading. The cost of this great piece must have been many thousands of dollars, but of course that is not given under the circumstances.

The masterpiece of the collection is a giant punch bowl of gilt, enameled, striking in design, magnificent in workmanship. It is one of the finest specimens of Russian classic art, and is claimed to be the most noteworthy thing of the sort ever done in the empire.

No other workman has attempted to do that in enamel which appears easy to these artisans of the far east. They enamel large surfaces with such perfect adhesion that if the silver underneath should be bent or indented the enamel would follow it without a break. In the making of transparent enamel, so that the light shines through it and produces the effect of most charming, they are absolutely unique. None of their imitators have attempted, much less accomplished, this difficult feat. The Russians produce some marvelous effects in the imitation of porcelains in silver. Across a bowl or plaque lies what on casual observation appears to be a linen napkin. You might, if circumstances favored, pick it up, or try to do so, but it is of silver. Near by is a beautiful napkin of what appears to be silk. It is solid silver.

Throughout all Russian work, as I have said, there runs a strong national characteristic. It shows itself in everything. The Russians are imitated, but they do not often imitate. This is true of their bronzes, as well. Here again one is surprised at the manifestation of Boyar skill. After the duty and sometimes finicky bronzes of other European nations, whose their endless play upon the female figure and allegorical illustrations, it is a great delight to turn to the bronzes of Russia. There is strength, vigor, action, the life of the steppes, of the army, of the chase. There is the open air, the work of the people, the animals domestic and wild, the drama of all life. Here is a Lepidoptera seated in his sledge while four reindeer plunge along over the frozen surface. Near by is a dromedary and his rider, traversing the sands of the desert, the two pieces together serving to remind us that the czar's domain extends from the icy north to the parched lands of the east and south.

A water cart is slowly moving along, drawn by a weary old mare with her nose near the ground and a big boy walking by her side. On the cart is the lad's father, with a open book, the boy, their old mare's colt, pony and lony, ambling on behind, suggesting the poverty of northern milk, the famine. An ox team is drawing a wagon toward the market. The driver, at the leads of his team, has a pipe in his mouth and you can see the cuss-word always accompanies ox-driving, even in Russia, escaping from his lips. There is much mud on the wheels of the rick cart, and the tracks of other vehicles are furrows in the roadway. A bear climbs a tree to escape the sportsman who is hot after him. A Lapp is killing a seal at an ice hole. Two horses, furiously driven and viciously whipped, are endeavoring to draw a sleigh with its two occupants from the track of the wolves who pursue. A mounted cossack has halted his horse while he lights his pipe—a bit of drawing which art students would do well to study. One man carries a group of ———— mamevering, the horses with a mad-cap recklessness for which the cossacks are justly celebrated.

Another woman has one foot in the stirrup of her cossack, and he bends over to reach with her lips and his other cossack lover who has just returned from the war. Another woman has one foot in the stirrup of her cossack, and he bends over to reach with her lips and his other cossack lover who has just returned from the war. They carry us to Russia, to Siberia, to the Caucasus. They are a delight after a surfeit of curls and diamonds, and the steps catching a wild horse with a long pole which has a noose at the end of it. A woman stands tip-toe upon a stump to reach with her lips and his other cossack lover who has just returned from the war. They carry us to Russia, to Siberia, to the Caucasus.
