John Raeburn was a good cholar, an excellent lawyer and a gentleman in every sense of the word, but in regard to the fair sex he was most unaccountably shy. Not that he was not capable of as sincere, deep and ardent an attachment as any man, but the very intensity of feeling brought along with it a discouraging and aggravating sense of every real or fancied deficiency or impediment that might interpose a barrier between himself and the young lady whom he had at first esteemed, then admired and finally loved.

Nevertheless the suggestion alluded to came just at a favorable moment, and without waiting for his habitual diffidence to rise up and render it unavailing he determined to seize the golden opportunity at once.

He touched a bell on his desk. Bertha waited to check off one last word and adjusted her typewriter for her next line, and then notebook in hand, appeared at the
