AN ELOPEMENT.

There is war among the Nicochea and Garcia families. The trouble, as usual, is over a girl, and in this case she happens to be Dolores Nicochea, the belle of Mexican society in San Diego for some years past. 18, tall, graceful and of charming manners. Her oval face is pensive, except when her | had not changed an iota. glorious dark eyes flash with mirth or passion. She has plenty of spunk and has lately snapped her fingers at four big brothers and eloped with a scion of an ancient enemy of her house.

Dolores had lived on Tenth street with her mother and brothers-Jose Gabriel, Salvador and Manuel. Her father is dead, but the boys have watched her with jealous care. Dolores has had plenty of chances to marry, but she has been very circumspect in receiving attentions from young men. Her brothers have helped her by chasing away every young fellow who came around and by spreading the alarming intelligence that death awaited the man who presumed to court their sister.

This method worked well with faint hearts, but it had no terrors for young Tomas Garcia. Tomas is 6 feet 2, 23 years old, good looking and as quick as the mountain Dolores two years ago at a fiesta at Tia Juana, on the Mexican line. He was then working on his father's rancho at Cerro Colorado, seven miles below the line. He quitted work and came to San Diego and ever since has carried on a courtship with Dolores. For a year she turned a deaf ear to him, and he rarely saw her. He saw friends separated them almost before the knives were drawn.

After that Dolores did not seem so cold. and less than a year ago Tomas was sure he could win her if only the chance of elopement offered. When the four big there was a mighty row. They related to her all the old cattle wars between the Nicocheas and Garcias and tried to arouse her family pride. She told them with great spirit that she didn't care how many feuds existed between the families; that she loved Tomas and some day would marry him. Then the boys sent word to Tomas that if he was ever seen with Dolores he would surely die. So matters have stood for the past six months. Dolores and Tomas have communicated in some way, but nobody knows how. The old senora, her mother, has watched her like a hawk, and the boys have been at her side whenever she appeared in public at baile or fiesta. It is strange, therefore, that Tomas should have run away with her so easily, but it is true that he has.

Last Sunday evening the old senora dozed.

Jose, Gabriel, Manuel and Salvador were all down town. Dolores looked mighty PROPRIETOR pretty, leaning her cheek on her hand at the open window, appearing half asleep. Once in awhile she glanced at her mother, and the glance was as quick and full of fire as a lightning flash. She kept glancing down the street, too, as if expecting something, and could hardly sit still as a light buggy and two fine horses swept around

The team came quietly enough, but with-out losing any time. Tomas said only one word, "Veni." That means "Come!" but it means more in Spanish. Dolores stepped past the dozing senora as lightly as if dancing the jarabe and in a second more was in

The time consumed in reaching the corner and getting out of the old lady's range of vision was probably one minute. If you have ever eloped, however, you can imagine how long it seemed to Dolores and Tomas. When the corner was turned—sas!—the whip descended, and the spirited horses leaped down National avenue toward the Mexican line. People along the road heard a buggy hustle through the night, but they thought it was somebody going for a doctor or something. The fleeing lovers went through National

City like a hurricane. It sounded exactly like a runaway, everybody at Chula Vista said. At Tia Juana, 16 miles from here, the horses were blowing like a bellows, and the custom house men say that the young lady in the buggy held a shotgun or rifle while the young man plied the whip. The commandante was not around when the horses dashed by, but two or three of the gendarmes made a feeble attempt to stop the invaders. They didn't like the looks of the woman with the gun, however, and so Tomas and Dolores got with their team into Mexico without paying duty—the only case on record in these parts. They drove right to Cerro Colorado and were married. Old Dom Pedro, Tomas' father, was tickled to death at securing the pearl of his enemy's tribe, and he will give Tomas a good ranch. When the big brothers got home and the old senora said she didn't know what had become of Dolores, there was-well, you can imagine what there was. Each of the four, with unerring instinct, headed for the corral, jammed a big silver bit into his horse's mouth, cinched the animal so tightly that it stood on tiptoe, and all swung into the

They reached Tia Juana less than an hour behind Tomas and Dolores. They asked the first man they met, who happened to be a Mexican custom house man, if he had seen a young couple. No, he had not. Others gathered around. Yes, they had seen a young couple in a buggy, driving like crazy people.

Jose, Salvador, Gabriel and Manuel looked at each other and prepared to push on. "Hold on, hold on!" said the custom house man; "you can't enter Mexico in that

The brothers knew then that all was lost. However, they tried to explain and argue. No, no; they must wait till manana and pay the duties on their horses or go back. "But," said they, "this is an extraordinary motor, case—an elopement, an abduction." "Bueno," said the custom house man, manana it could be all arranged. By this time the boys were surrounded by a swarm of gendarmes, all wrapped in serapes and smoking cigarettes.

So the four brothers came home. They swear by all the demonios that Tomas Garcia is already dead, but people say that before Tomas dies there is liable to be a funeral among his brothers-in-law. They say that Dolores has more spunk than all the TOWELS. old senora and the four brothers will have to sue for peace if they ever expect to see Dolores again. Meantime the war is on.—

THE TRICOLOR GIRL

The big "liner" was slowly backing into her berth in the North river. The steamer's decks were thronged with returning tourists, most of whom were peering eagerly at the crowds of waiting relatives and friends on the wharf.

"There's Joe," whispered a happy looking girl to her aunt. "He looks handsomer Druggists, at 50c. and $1.00. than ever. See, there he is, standing over there by that post." Perhaps the prettiest girl on the steamer was one who stood all by herself. She had shown such a retiring disposition during the whole of the trip over that but few of the passengers knew her name. By most she was called "the tricolor girl." That she was French and a Parisian was unquestionable. She possessed that nattiness, that Two persons were killed and 22 wounded "chic," which other than Parisian women in a riot at Detroit last Friday between strikmay imitate, but cannot acquire. The name of "the tricolor girl" had been given 'ing Poles and the water works officials.

to her because she invariably wore at her throat a dainty bow of tricolored ribbon. Her name, which few knew, was Marie St.

She, too, was gazing at the pier in the hope of seeing one particular and familiar face. Marie had journeyed to the new world to meet and marry her lover, M. Paul Grochette. Upon the death of her parents she had found herself so poor that in making the journey she was compelled to do what no modest French girl cares to do-

A newcomer began to edge his way through the crowd, and as Marie caught sight of him her eyes brightened and then moistened. It was Paul, looking as perfect Dolores is in the flower of her youth, just | and flawless as ever. Marie had not seen him for two years, but in that time Paul After the inevitable telegraphy in lovers' handkerchief code, both lovers waited impatiently for the drawing aboard of the gang plank. Almost the first one to go ashore was Marie, who ran down the gang plank and rushed plump into her lover's arms. Their first salutations over, he conducted her to his mother, who was waiting at some distance up the pier. Every one who saw the lovers envied them their happiness. Two men in the admiring throng happened to be detectives who had come down to the pier in answer to a message from quarantine to the effect that in the trip over Mrs. Hope-Stanley of

The detective glanced at the note and then said sharply:

> get this note?" Marie couldn't speak English, and Paul acted as interpreter. Through him she repeated that she received it from a certain banker in Paris the day before starting. The detective was professionally skeptical, and the upshot of it was that the detective, the "tricolor girl," fiance and mamma all went to police headquarters in a cab. Mrs. Hope-Stanley came later in the day and positively identified the note by its number. Paul, who felt the disgrace and annoyance of it all as keenly as did the dainty "tricolor girl" herself, wandered distractedly about the corridors of police headquarters. Finally he decided to confide his troubles to two of the police reporters, who looked jolly, and who might possibly be sympathatic. They were. "Why," said one of them, "get the police to cable the banker in Paris, asking him if he remembers the number of the 1,000 franc note he gave Mile. St. Pierre." Paul wrung their hands gratefully and wondered why he had not thought of this course before. He carried the idea out at once. Before the day was over an answering cablegram came, giving the number of the identical 1,000 franc note found in Mlle. St. Pierre's trunk. "Then she can't have stolen it," decided

Mrs. Hope-Stanley was sent for again, and then the fact came out that she had mistakenly given a wrong number. "It was only the difference between a '4' and a '5,' " she said apologetically. A slight difference perhaps, but it had been the cause of a deep humiliation to the "tricolor girl." Marie was now released with deep apologies and went to Paul's home. The lovers were happy again and have been happy ever since, but they can never forget the stupid mistake of another that caused such an unpleasant American reception for the "tricolor girl."-Exchange.

Stilling the Wild Waves. A German physician has been making a series of experiments to test the comparative value of different kinds of oil for the purpose of stilling the waters. He declares that petroleum or paraffin is of no use whatever and olive oil of little value. On the other hand he says that rapeseed oil and oil of turpentine have considerable effect, but the most effective of all oils is train oil. Not satisfied with these experiments, he then set to work with other fatty materials and reports that he found a solution of soap to be far superior as a wave stiller to any kind of oil. He says that only a very thin solution of soan is required, about one part of soap to a thousand parts of water.
