A GREAT TRAVELER.

Going to London in the second-class compartment of a fast train one morning I met the greatest traveler in the world. It happened in this way. There was a friend with me whom I met on | right place after all, and when he took the railway platform, and we entered me into his first floor sitting-room I together a second-class compartment | found it the most amazing room I had that contained one passenger, a middle-aged man who sat in a corner. It was ed with books, and all of one kind. a wintry day of most disagreeable char- Every book the Baedeker or Lradshaw acter. There was snow and sleet and a strong east wind. It rained occasionally, and the wind blew in gusts no matter what was coming down. The compartment was unheated, of course, and we shivered as we sat there. My friend

"What a fool any man is to spend the winter in England if he can scrape together enough money to live anywhere else, and even if he has no money he owes it to himself to tramp out of the "You can't do that," I said, "for, if you remember, the country is surrounded by salt water." "Oh, water!" cried my friend in dis-gust. "There is water, water every-where, pouring down on us, surround-ing us, and if it were not for the drop to drink I don't know what we would do. Now where would you rather be on a day like this? I'll tell you what I think yearningly about; it is the Corniche road, between Nice and Mentone, with the sun beating upon one and the Medi-terranean blue and sparkling away down below on the right hand. What's your

"Well, if I had my way," I said, "I would go to the island of Sicily; there is a forty-mile road there, I understand, which goes around the base of Mount Aetna. I should like to be with some good fellow tramping along that

You reach it from the Mediterranean coast by a wonderful railroad going through gorges in the mountains. It is just beyond the foothills itself, and is an oasis, almost, in the Sahara. There, the weather is always fine in winter, the air being invariably pure and clear. To the north you have the mountains, which makes fine scenery easily accessible; besides, they cut off all northerly winds. There is reasonably good hotel accommodation, and you can see much of Arab life." We arrived at the London terminus almost before we thought we had started, the man in the corner had talked so charmingly of resorts both for summer and winter. After that day in the train I met him often, watching for him on the railway platform of my suburb.

We sometimes journeyed home together, but he usually came by a later train than I did, so I mainly depended upon seeing him in going to town. He was the most marvelously-traveled man I had ever met. There seemed not to be a great on this certh with which he was a spot on this earth with which he was unfamiliar. He had the most minute information, and for a time I had expected that he would go upon some continental trip with me, but unfortunately he never could get off just when I hapwent, however, he always gave me useful information about the spot to which I was going. He wrote down the name of the best hotel that was at the same time reasonable in its charges. He same time reasonable in its charges. He gave me hints on travel, how to get there at the least expense, and where there was a choice of two routes he indicated the better one to take. He frequently gave me letters of introduction to hotelkeepers, mentioning the correct charges for rooms and board, and I found these always exceedingly useful and much respected by hotel men, who vaguely remembered him. He was a man who thoroughly knew the ropes. On returning one summer I missed him for a week or more at the railway station. He was a most methodical man, always leaving by the same train in the morning and returning by the same train at night. After missing him for ten days, I looked his name up in the local directory, and called at his residence. It was a boarding-house apparently, and the landlady told me that I was quite correct in surmising he was out of town. He had gone, she said, on his

"Oh, dear! no," she answered; "he has never been on the continent in his life.' "Never been on the continent?" I ask ed in surprise. "Not that I know of, and he has lived with me for twenty years. He has the two rooms on my first floor, and is as regular as clockwork." "Oh, in that case," I said; "he is not the man I am looking for. The man I want is the greatest traveler I ever met; he has been all over the world." "Ah, then," said the landlady; "it is not my lodger, for he is a clerk in a lawyer's office, and has been all his life; he gets only two weeks in the summer, and then he runs down to a little place on the coast. He did not give you this address, did he?" "No, he did not," I answered, "I looked it up in the local directory." "Then you must be looking for someone else," said she.

This was so very evidently the case found my friend on the train as usual. Druggists, at 50c. and $1.00. I told him of the strange coincidence that in the same suburb there should live a man the same name as himself who never traveled, but always went, during his vacation, to the same little place down by the sea. My friend smiled somewhat warmly. and said: "If you think over our talks you will remember that I never claimed to have been in any of the places I have "Never claimed!" I cried in astonishment. "Why you gave me the most minute particulars of all those places." "Quite so," he said, "still I never said that I had been to any of them; that was merely your own inference. Will you come and see me in my rooms to-

1 promised to do so and went accordingly. I found that I had been at the every kind and of every country that he had picked up on his small salary at second-hand bookstalls. There was a large portfolio of photographs and engravings, most of the engravings being on steel or wood, and every locality under the sun was pictured. Twenty years ago my traveler confessed, he had a great desire to see foreign parts, but, alas, he had neither the time nor the money, so he had done the next best thing, and traveled entirely in his imagination. He had now practically lost all desire for foreign travel, for when I asked him to accompany me as my guest over to Brittany, he shook his head, and said, that his own mind-pictures of these places were so vivid that he feared the sight of the places themselves would result in disappointment. I saw him the other day, and he was looking forward with pleasant anticipation to his annual little trip to the sea. He had picked up, he said, four books of travel that were new

When you tramp that sixty-mile road you ought to do it very comfortably in three days, but you will find hotel accommodations exceedingly bad. The food will be unfit to eat, and the sleeping quarters"—here he shrugged his shoulders—"well, you must put up with them as best you may. I suppose," he added, turning to my friend, "that when you walked from Nice to Mentone you lunched at Turbie."

"Yes, we did," admitted my friend.
"They give you a very decent lunch there," continued the man in the corner, "but if you have a large party it is always better to order it by telegraph from Nice beforehand. I suppose you did not notice in this morning's weather reports—some papers publish the weather reports of different points in Europe and some do not—that the weather both in Sicily and along the Corniche road during the last rough has been accommodation.

Mr. Wm. Thompson of Muscuash, N. She became weak and nervous, lost all energy, and had a constant feeling of dread. She suffered with intense pain in the stomach after eating, which was usually followed by the smothering sensation about the heart and fainting spells. She tried a great many remedies and was treated by the doctors for some time, but obtained no relief. She became so discouraged that she gave up all hope of ever getting better, when our pastor suggested that she try HAWKER'S NERVE AND STOMACH TONIC and LIVER PILLS, which had produced remarkable cures in several cases he knew of. We did so and she obtained immediate relief from the distress after taking the second dose, and has continued to improve ever since until today she is as well as ever, and can enjoy her food without fear of suffering. I cannot speak too highly of these valuable medicines which have restored my wife to health and strength and saved much suffering and expense."
