HE WHISPERED.

They met on the steamer. He was a modest, inoffensive youth, one of the kind seldom appreciated on short acquaintance, and yet at heart a sensible, honest, intelligent fellow. She was young, good looking and independent, one of those girls who, having made up their minds that they want a thing, set themselves to work at once to get it. Now, long before the Paris had reached Liverpool she had decided that she wanted this particular young man more than anything else in the world, and, as was her habit, having come to a conclusion, she went to work in earnest to accomplish her

He was willing to be won, but lacked the courage to speak the words that were always trembling on his lips, but never left them. She had helped him on repeatedlyin fact, had almost spoken for him, so anxious was she to answer "Yes," but always, just as he was about to speak, the thought of his boldness and the importance of the step swept over him like a flood, in which he sank, gasping hopelessly for breath. I am afraid, had it been leap year, this eager young woman would have exercised the right that season gives to her sex, in which case much trouble would have been saved them both; but it was not leap year, so she still waited and hoped. This was the state of affairs at the end of a month which he had spent with her party in the north of England. During this time she had courted him in railway carriages, on steamboats, at the tops of mountains, in the crypts of cathedrals and in ruined abbeys. She had prayed that he might find courage to speak, and, I am afraid, had sworn mildly, as young ladies sometimes do, because he had

They had reached London, that city of historical associations and fog, and were doing the sights. Side by side they wandered through the somber aisles of Westminster abbey; together they gazed at the crown jewels in the Tower. They had been all over the city on the tops of penny buses, and had gone from Westminster bridge to London bridge on the penny boats, and during all these trips she had never for a moment lost sight of the object she ever pursued, and which, like the will-o'-thewisp, persistently evaded her.

One morning they strolled into St. Paul's cathedral, and Baedeker in hand wandered down its lofty aisles filled with marble tributes to the memory of fallen heroes, Then, having paid their sixpences, they climbed the 260 steps that ended in the celebrated whispering gallery. As every one knows, this gallery is at the base of the great dome 100 feet above the pavement. They emerged from the dimly lighted spiral stairway, whose stone steps are worn by the feet of countless tourists, into the great circle where stood an old man, his scanty white locks covered with a black skullcap. He looked as though he might have lived in that lofty gallery, with-PROPRIETOR out once visiting the earth below, ever since the day of its completion. "Please take the seats on the opposite side," he said. "Put your ears close to the wall, and you will hear distinctly what I say in a low whisper over a hundred feet away." A moment later, and they had made the circuit of the gallery and were seated, their ears pressed against the wall, their heads very near together. Far away across the open space from which tose the sound of many footfalls below they saw the old man place his lips to the curved surface of the wall. Then they started as they heard these words, uttered in low sepulchral tones, coming apparently from the other side of the petition: "The building of this cathedral was commenced in the year 1675 by Sir Christopher Wren. It was 35 years in building and cost £747,954." Then followed the dimensions and much uninter-He listened intently, but she had hardly heard a word the old man said. An idea had struck her, and turning eagerly to her companion she said: "Go around to the other side and whisper to me. It will be ever so much nicer than all this dry stuff and so romantic."

He arose obediently, then stopped, and with an air of confusion asked what he Now was her opportunity, and she must seize it. Looking straight into his eyes with an earnestness that brought a blush to the young man's face, she said: "Whisper what is nearest to your heart!" He left her hurriedly, a look of determination on his face such as had never been there before. A moment more, and he was seated at the opposite side of the gallery. He hesitated, glanced across the space that divided them, then resolutely placed his lips to the wall. Her heart seemed to stop beating; her face grew rigid and colorless. Eagerly she waited, but only for a moment. Then the color rushed back to her cheeks, and a triumphant light came into her eyes. -Fred Grant Young in Kate Field's Wash-

A Meat Diet.

In a family of growing children where any one exhibits a tendency to undergrowth a meat diet should be encouraged. There is no doubt that if persisted in from early years an appreciable effect is made upon the height, other conditions being good. Parents are very apt to accept hereditary standards for the height of the children, warranted by J. Pallen & Son. and because father or mother is short expect certain of the children to be similarly undersized. This tendency is said on good authority to be capable of being combated if thus attacked during the formative years.

THE BETROTHAL.

When the Princess Othilde came into the world, every one exclaimed with admiration and astonishment-with admiration because she was the prettiest little thing imaginable, and with astonishment because she was scarcely as big as a baby's

To tell the truth, the king and queen were rather disturbed at seeing her so extraordinarily small, and their royal dignity could not support the idea of having given birth to a dwarf, but they hoped that their daughter might grow without losing anything of her loveliness. They were, however, very much deceived in their expectations. While remaining as graceful as possible, she grew so little that at the age of 5 she was no higher than a blade of grass, and when playing in the garden walks she was obliged to stretch herself on the points of her toes to gather

The king and queen had recourse to the fairies, with whom they had always been I

The charms of the fairies had no more effect than the medicines of the learned men. At 16 the princess was still so small that it happened one morning she was caught entirely in a trap which had been set in the park for nightingales. The courtiers-who were interested in keeping their sovereigns happy, because good humor generally shows itself generous -did their best to console the king and queen. They declared that nothing is more ridiculous than a tall figure; that high stature is, if you consider the matter well, but a deformity. As for any of them, they would not wish to be more than half a foot in height, but it is for royal races that nature reserves her favors! But these ingenious flatteries did not always succeed in smoothing over the king and queen. Many a time they felt inclined to weep when kissing their little girl with the tips of their lips for fear of swallowing her, but they restrained their tears so as not to soak her quite through. As for Othilde, she did not appear the least distressed about her misfortune. She even seemed to on excellent terms. They did not fail to come, some on litters of cloth of gold with jeweled fringes, carried by naked negroes, others in cars of crystal drawn by four unicorns. One after the other they touched mirror made out of one rather large dia-In consequence of the tale they told him of the beauty of the princess the young emperor of Sirinagor fell in love with her and sent his embassadors to ask her hand in marriage. You may imagine the embarrassment such a proposal caused. To marry this tiny doll, no bigger than a paroquet -it was not to be thought of.

What man could accommodate himself to a wife who would to a certainty lose herself every minute? And the request of the emperor of Sirinagor was all the more dreadful because he himself was said to be of colossal proportions. He was the handsomest of all the princes, but the biggest of all the giants. At 3 years of age he had to stoop a little to take the birds' nests from the tops of the oaks. His parents, like those of Othilde, had consulted the physicians and then the fairies and quite as vainly. He grew more and more in a most immoderate fashion. When his people erected triumphant arches to him in celebration of some victory, he was forced to get down from his horse to pass underneath, and however high they were he never failed to strike the pediments with the silver crest displayed on his helmet. The king and queen naturally de-clared to the embassadors that the union in question was the most impossible thing in the world. But the young emperor, passionate as he was of temperament, would not be satisfied with this reply. He would not listen to anything. The confession of the small size of Othilde appeared to him an absurd statement, conceived with the intention of turning him into ridicule, and he swore as he donned his helmet on which the silver wings trembled that he would avenge this insult with fire and blood. * * * * * * *

He kept his word. There were terrible battles, towns sacked and whole populations put to the edge of the sword, so that at last the king and queen saw plainly that the same would be done to them and all their kingdom if they did not come to terms with the gigantic conqueror, who was striding across the burning towns and forests in his march toward the capital. They hastened, therefore, to demand peace, promising no longer to refuse him the hand of their daughter. A day was chosen for the first interview of the affianced ones, but it took place in the park, not in the palace, because the conqueror would not have been able to stand upright under the ceilings of the halls. "Come," said he. "I see no princess. Will she not soon be coming?" "Look at your feet," said the king. She was there in fact, scarcely higher than the borders of the walk. So slender and so pretty in her gown of gold, her brows glistening with gems, she seemed still smaller by the side of the magnificent emperor, whose armor rose toward the sky, bathed in sunlight. "Alas!" said he. For he was grieved to see her down there, so charming and so small. "Alas!" she said in her turn. For she was very sorry to see him so far up there, so handsome, but so tall. They had tears-she in her upturned, he in his downcast, eyes. "Sire," said the king while they were still contemplating each other from a distance; "sire, you see that you could not marry my daughter. We are compelled to relinquish the honor of your alliance"-But he did not finish his sentence, and dumb with astonishment gazed at the princess and the emperor, she growing taller and he shorter, all through love-more powerful than the fairies—which attracted them one toward the other till, almost the same height, their lips touched like two roses on the same spray.-Million, A Sure Sign.
