DHATHAM, N. B., - - AUJUST 30, 1894 I CANNOT TELL.

Is she slender, tall and stately, With figure most dirine Is she fairer than a lily. This sweetheart dear of mine? Is she like unto a fairy.
With step so free and light?

And a voice as low and tender As a bird song in the night? Hath she dark blue eyes, I wonder, Like to a violet's hue? And cheeks of warm, red roses, Aglow with morning dew? Hath she red, red lips, this maiden,

And dimpled hands so r?

Doth the sunlight seem redimmer

Through the ripples of ner hair? I cannot tell-I only know She's all the world to me; For Love is blind, the sage hath said, And so-I cannot see.

DICK'S LESSON.

He leaned across the pasture bars, calling: "Molly! Molly!" A woman came to the kitchen doora bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked woman; a woman with the look of one who can both plan and accomplish large things. "Well?" she questioned. "I want dinner early," he said. "I'm going to town this afternoon. Abner'll be here, too. I set him to plowing in the south lot this morning.

"But, Dick, you're not going off without cutting the wood!" called Molly, as he took up the gun he had stood against called again; but he did not turn or look back; and Molly, catching up the baby cronies that were trying to wink at the gudeman's sins of omission. But not a

Such a wonderful morning it was! Everything seemed to be rejoicing in the new awakening of nature. Far off, in the shadows of the woods, and in some sequestered fence corners, Molly could see the snow-drifts that still lingered, as if loath to leave such a glad, But there was work waiting to be done, and only one pair of hands to do it. They were strong, resolute hands, and Molly hurried back into the house, setting herself to the tasks before her with the deft fingers and wise forethought that always seemed to work such miracles in her homely world. Little Jessie followed her about, watching with grave, sweet eyes while her mother skimmed the cream from the long row of shining pans in the milk-room and prepared the morning's churning. Then, while she churned and the

of young dogs, when they are observed little one quietly amused herself, Molly to rise on their hind legs, attempting to planned the day's campaign; or, rather, planned the day's campaign; or, rather, bite, overthrow or seize each other reinforced her courage for the attack without once closing their teeth." Mr. already planned, with reasons that seemed to her both strong and just. The churning done, Jessie was at her side begging to be rocked to sleep. "Sing, 'Hush,' mamma," she said, laying the bright head against her mother's hand, that she had taken in

Molly drew her rocking chair near the south window, and, with Jessie cuddled close in loving arms, crooned softly to her that sweet old hymn that has soothed so many childish hearts:

"Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber; Holy angels guard thy bed," It was not a part of Moily's wisdom to deny herself or her child the exquisite pleasure this afforded. Whatever might be said in support of the theory and practice of disciplining the little ones to forego this "coddling," Molly's true and tender mother heart was its own law giver, and with a reverent joy she tasted daily of this cup of blessing; the purest and sweetest that life could ever bring. She knew that she had never come so near to heaven's bliss as this. She knew the same ecstatic joy that worn a smart little toque ornamented Mary felt when she cradled in her arms | with jewels or a white aigrette. The the infant Christ. And, in all the years to come, when never again that sunny head could rest upon her breast, there must always remain this blessed remembrance. Though, like Paul, she might be "in perils often," aye, though even "the sword might pierce her own soul," no deepest sorrow, no sharpest trial, could ever rob her of this sacred

When Jessie had fallen into the sweet, undreaming slumber of childhood, Molly laid her gently upon her bed, and, opening the door into the L, ran quickly up the back stairs into the attic. From the crossbeams overhead hung great braided bunches of sweet corn, kept for seed. The air was redolent of pennyroyal, mint and sweet fern. Molly crossed the large, unfinished room and stopped before a pile of ax-helves. They were of seasoned hickory and showed careful workmanship. Dick had hewn them out during some of the stormy winter days, intending to sell them at his leisure. He had shown not a little pride in the success of his work, and had exhibited them many times to admiring friends. "About as good a job, I guess, as those hammers of Maydole that they cry up so," he said sometimes, feeling that by this unusual effort and accomplishment he had can-effort and accomplishment he had cancelled many shortcomings.

"Poor Dick!" said Molly to herself, stopping to pick up one of the ax-helves.

"Poor Dick! It's such a pity his mother hadn't taught him that 'no man liveth or dieth unto himself;' then this lesson wouldn't have been needed. Maybe, though, this strain of selfishness is something he takes from some old ancestor, and such traits are slow in coming to the surface sometimes. But, there! I've no time to climb genealogical trees. This is much more like cutting one down. As Parson Tremalow cal trees. This is much more like cutting one down. As Parson Tremalow would say: 'It's foreordained' That's it, I guess, and not so difficult to understand, either. Dick had certainly been a 'free agent,' there was nothing to keep him from cutting the wood. I've been patient, too, till he really makes capital of my patience, and expects me to 'manage somehow.' I've cut the wood myself, and even gone out into the woods gathering sticks, like the poor widow in the Bible. I've tried giving him cold dinners, and he only sulks and goes off hunting. Yes, it sulks and goes off hunting. Yes, it must be done." Molly picked up the other ax-helves, and ran downstairs and out to the woodpile. No Dick in sight and time to begin getting dinner. Far off in the woods she could hear the sound of his gun. One ax-helve after another was laid across the sawhorse and deftly sawed into lengths suitable for the stove, for experience had been an exacting teacher.

When Dick and Abner, the hired man, came into dinner they found it all ready, smoking hot, upon the table.
"Well," said Dick, "I'm tired; such a race as I had after that rabbit, and lost him, after all!" He ate quickly, and said, harness, Abner; I've got other things to see to." A moment after Molly heard him climbing the back stairs and creaking across the attic floor. He came down in a hurry, flinging open the door:

Molly went to the stove, and, lifting

Just at daybreak, the next morning. Molly was awakened by the ringing blows of an ax. When Dick came in to breakfast, Abner came with him. Dick was saying: "Well, we'll use that crosscut saw and make quick work with the old logs. They say confession's good for the soul, and I might's well confess that I've been letting Molly lift the heaviest end. He stooped and caught up Jessie, lifting her high above him, and then dropping her gently into her chair at the table. Molly turned and looked at Dick,

The song of a robin ant I saw that they were approaching fluttered out upon the air—such a tri-umphant burst of melody that the baby clapped her hands and laughed. "Oh," the cheek of one of his fellows. After the cheek of one of his fellows. After these preniminaries, which very much resembled caressing, they were ob served to raise themselves upright on their hind legs by pairs, struggle together, seize each other by mandible foot or antennae, and then immediates; relax their hold, only to renew the attack again in a moment. They would fasten to each other's shoulders, embrace and wrestie, overthrow each other, and then raise themselves by turns, each taking revenge without producing any serious mischief. They did not spurt out their venom as they do in real combats, nor retain their hold upon their opponents with such obstinacy. I have seen some so eager in these exercises that they would pursue and vanquish several in succession, only struggling with each a few seconds. In one place two ants appeared to be gamboling about a stalk of straw, turning alternately to avoid or seize each other, which forcibly brought Huber tells of other queer habits of ants, such as their running races, carry ing each other upon their backs, etc. characteristics which certainly prove that they are endowed with a very high degree of intelligence.-Philadelphia

Peeps Inside a Harem. It is only on rare and special occasions that ladies are permitted to visit the sultan's harem. It is considered a very great privilege, and few beneath the rank of an ambassadress can ever aspire to it. There are a great number of ladies in the harem, some of them, according to a writer in the New York Journal, being very beautiful. Each has her own allowance for dress and other expenses, and the young and pret ty women generally get all their clothes from Paris, though many are still content with the old-fashioned Turkish dress, which is not unlike our own tea gowns. They wear no veils in the house and they usually wear their hair in great distinction which they all D. covet is the decoration of "the three tails," which is only conferred on the greatest ladies of the palace or some special favorite. These tails are composed of plaited hair, not unlike the Chinese pig tail, though shorter, as they only reach a little below the waist. To have one of these tails is a great honor, while the bestowal of all three will go far to make the recipient a provid and happy woman for life. Another decoration, a very handsome one in diamonds, which is occasionally conferred upon ladies, is the Shefkat, and that has also been bestowed upon European ladies. The gardens of Yildiz Kiosk are beauti fully laid out, with much ornamental water in the form of lakes, fountains and streams; over the latter are pretty rustic bridges, while upon the stretches of lawn rare and beautiful plants and flowers are to be seen and shady groves lie beyond. There are a number of pretty summer houses in the grounds; some of these are richly furnished and are large enough to serve as a residence for an honored guest. The sultan is
