Mania and Marysia were 16 years of age, and both possessed the grave and melancholy beauty of the Uranian maidens, the large eyes, blue as the evening sky, and the heavy brown tresses. They seemed to be sisters as arm in arm they wandered by themselves across the sleeping moors and in the glades among the firs. They bore no relation to each other, however, save that of friendship; but, oh, how dearly they loved one another!

MANIA AND MARYSIA

Orphans, neither the one nor the other had known her father, needy laborers who had died young, but with both still lingered the memory of a tragic day when men in black garments had carried away the bodies of their sweet, dead mothers to lay them away in the tomb. Mania and Marysia had known each other ing, threw herself sobbing on Marysia's neck, on leaving the church where still burned the funeral tapers, it was then only that their affection became strong, almost fierce. It had a singular charm, this absorbing love for each other, between these two pure childish souls in the midst of this hard rural life, surrounded by a landscape harsh and sad, where witchcraft ruled, and each osier tree and galloped over the plains by night with stealthy step.

Mania and Marysia lived in the same "hata" and cultivated a little strip of ground which supplied their few wants. Evenings while spinning they filled one another with superstitious fears by reciting the legends in which their young memories were already rich, as of a certain person, who, awakening once about midnight on the border of a meadow, where fatigue had overtaken him, perceived a woman standing near him. As he regarded her curiously, he noticed that she had feet like a

On entering the village he related his vision, and people were not surprised when shortly afterward a pestilence raged among the cattle, for the specter was none other than the death of the cows. The same presentiment personified caused the cholera to appear under the form of a woman who walked on the water, sighing sadly. She had red shoes and a collar of coral. Then, too, the treasures that became weary of sleeping in the carth and offered themselves, revealing their presence by some supernatural sign-a blue flame, a cat or a child running hurriedly around the place where the gold was found buried. Mania and Marysia being very pious did not fail in any church service. When from their lonely "hata" they heard the holy bells call to prayers, the two young girls hastened to carry to the feet of the images, all shining with fine gold and glowing colors, the goodly offering of their little souls as chaste as the hollyhocks. But when after the service the youths wished to take them to the dance Mania and Marysia fled frightened like two wild par-On a certain evening they were spinning hemp by the light of resinous branches which burned in the fire lace. The night outside was lighted only by occasional stars, and the snow fell intermittently. At intervals the gusts raised clouds of sleet that tapped against the windows like swarms of frighted moths seeking refuge. And, behold, as midnight approached came the sound of church bells, confused The orphans looked at one another surprised. The holy feasts of the calendar SHOP, they knew by heart, and surely none fell upon this particular day, much less at this "Without a doubt we have but imagined that we heard the bells," they said to each other. But no. The bells rang, and their voice, beautiful and sad, floated languidly on the limpid air like a bark on the water.

"Since the Lord calls, he must be obeyed. And the two friends in haste covered with lambskin their trembling shoulders ing? and departed. The church, filled with the faithful, was aglow with the light of many tapers. The orphans felt their hearts freeze within them when they saw that this multitude was standing absolutely mute and motion-

At last the young girls recognized a few, but they were those of people already dead. Shivering with fright, Mania and Marysia tried to pray with fervor and not to heed the sinister assembly.

The great door opened, and before the high altar appeared the officiating priest. | cuts out of newspapers. His mother was When he turned toward the worshipers, the young girls could see his long white beard, descending to his waist, and his hair streaming over his shoulders. They recognized then a holy pastor who had been dead a hundred years and whose portrait hung on the wall of the presbytery. It was he, just could have stood the knocking about. as he appeared in the painting, feature for This morning, too, he is much better, feature. On his yellow skin, however, appeared something dull, like ancient mold. Mania perseived near them her dead godmother, and a little farther along her own dear mother. The latter remained indifferent, like a stranger, without even seeing her child, but the godmother bent toward the orphan and said hastily in her ear:

| Alter that unlucky night when she lost her pretty lace. She has not as yet discovered why she lost him. "Why did you come here, little one? Fly, for the love of God! Fly quickly! And if you are followed throw all that you can Hearing this, Mania and Marysia strove

The dead satiated their wrath for an instant on these objects; their creaking fingers rent them; their grinding teeth tore them spitefully. Then the pursuit recommenced. The vast arch of the dark sky embroidered now with silvery stars had the air of a funeral cloth above the winding sheet of snow stretched over the sleeping plain. The haggard eyes of the two fugitives seemed to see running before them the convulsed silhouettes of the bushes, and at their heels sounded the steps of the horrible and fantastic throng,

Mania and Marysia threw away their skirts, and their finely worked "koschula," and their beads, and holy medals. They reached at last their "hata," half dead from fright and cold. Then, as one of them belted the door, she heard an indescribable voice say these

"You are saved, my pretty ones, you are saved, but it will not become you to remain at the sacrament of the dead." And indeed they did not remain long. They never arose again from the bed in which they sank trembling in a fever caused by the fright and cold of that awful night. Two weeks afterward they both died and went to rejoin in the cemetery he army of the dead. Thus they atoned for having by their presence profaned the mystery of the dead -the solemn and dreadful mystery of the
