Mrs. John Forder had no premonition of evil. When she heard the hall clock strike nine she was blithely singing about the house as she attended to her morning duties, and she little imagined that she was entering the darkest hour of her life, and that before the clock struck again overwhelming disaster would have fallen upon her. Her young husband was working in the garden as was his habit each morning before going to his office. She expected him in every moment to make ready for his departure down town. She heard the click of the front gate and a moment later some angry words. Alarmed, she was about to look through the gate, with a smoking pistol still in Human lives often hang on trivialities. The murderer in his anxiety to be undisturbed had closed the front gate tightly. The wall was so high as to shut out observation from the street, but the height made it difficult for an outsider to see over it also rendered escape imgate open he might have got away unnoticed, but as it was, Mrs. Forder's screams aroused the neighborhood, and before the murderer succeeded in undoing, a crowd had collected with a policeman in its centre, and escape was out of the question. Only one shot had been fired, but at such close quarters that the bullet went through the body. John Forder was not dead, but lay on the grass insensible He was carried into the house and the family physician summoned. The doctor sent for a specialist to assist him, and the two men consulted together. To the distracted woman they were able to give but little comfort. The case at best was a doubtful one. There was very little. Meanwhile the murderer lay in custody, his own fate depending much on the fate of his victim. Forder died, bail would be refused if he showed signs of recovery, his assailant had a chance for, at least, temporary liberty. No one in the city, unless the wife herself, was more anxious for Forder's recovery than the man who who had shot town was horrified at what it conhis few friends began once more to hope. Forder still lingered between life and death. That he would ultimately die from his wound was regarded as certain, but the law required that a man should die within a stated time, otherwise the assailant could not be tried for murder. The limit provided by the law was almost reached and Forder still lived. Time also worked in Radnor's favor another direction. The sharp indignation that had followed crime had become dulled. startling events occurred which usurped the place held by the Forder tragedy, and Radnor's friends received more and more en-
