HIS DREAM DISPELLED.

Her face was like a poem rare, Her form angelic to behold. The dept' of beauty in her eyes A pure and lofty nature told.

In West-side Park at e'en she stood.
In the water gazed with thoughtful eyes; Perhaps she saw reflected there Bright angels darting 'cross the skies. What wonder that my heart beat fast

With deep emotion long unknown?

A fervent longing filled my breast
To win that angle for my own. With this emotion scarce subdued I ventured, "What a glorious night!" The angel moved seraphic lips,

TWO HEROES.

And said, "You bet! it's out of sight."

Six hundred Indians were camped outside the walls of the fort threatening to attack and destroy it. Inside were twenty white men, brave and well mounted, under command of Lieut. D. in addition to these there were the regular occupants of the fort including the Hudson's Bay Company's officer, his family and employes, the latter being unmarried men. The Indians had risen in revolt, and after destroying several houses and the mission church, were now bent on the destruction of the fort. A couple of priests had been killed at the mission, and the redskins declared that they would not be satisfied until they had lriven every soldier out of the country. Lieut. D.'s position was an extremely perilous one, because the Indians threatened to burn down the fort, which was a mere stockade, strongly built, it is true, but net pre against the fames which the besieging savages were preparing to direct against it. There was every confidence in the minds of the lieutenant and his men that protected by the walls they could keep the Indians in check until reinforcements arrived, but they felt that they could not fight against fire.

At this stage the Indians expressed a desire to treat with the Hudson's Bay Company officer, who stated his willingness to go out and meet them but Light. ness to go out and meet them, but Lieut. D would not consent to this unless he went accompanied by two of the troopers. According Mr. L (for such I shall call the H. B. C. officer) sallied forth with a mounted soldier on each side of him, but the Indians would not allow him to approach them unless the troop-ers were sent fack to the fort.

"We want to speak to you alone," they shouted to Mr. L, "and these men must go back. You are our friend and they are our enemies. We are the child. ren of the Hudson's Bay Company; let the white warriors go back."
Mr. L then told the soldiers to return, and proceeded alone to meet the band. Ie was received by several of the chiefs, who told him that the white soldiers nust be sent out of the fort, and promsed in that case to leave it in peace. They assured Mr. L that they had no quarrel with him or the company, but if the soldiers remained they would destroy everything in the fort, including himself and his family. Mr. L then returned within the stockide and strongly advised Lieut. D to escape with his men and leave him and his people to their fate, assuring him, howver, of his belief that the Indians would not harm them. But the lieutenant proested against his course, and upon call-ng a council of his men they fully agreed with him and declared in favor of remaining at their post. Then something strange occurred. But before relating it I must go back to the night preceding the council and tell what then took place. The men were resting with their arms ready for any emergency and prepared o resist an attack at a moment's notice. ying close to each other were two omrades engaged in a whispered conversation, and this is what they said: "Pierre," said one, whose name was Tack Cohn, "we are in a tight box, and hate to think of all the boys being purdered, for that is what it means. t ain't goin' to be a fair fight. The ientenant is game, but it will be a slaughter."

"Yes," replied Pierre, "Mr. L is right. We ought to get out of here without ighting if we can. The red devils will e too much for us. I hate to run away s much as any one, but what's the use of staying? They'll be too much for "Say, Pierre," said Cohn, "you and I know more about Indian fighting than he rest of the boys; can't we hit upon some scheme to save them. I guess the "Well," replied Pierre, "there is only one way to do it that I can think of. It means running away sure, but it's the only scheme I can get through my

"What is it?" asked Cohn, eagerly. "You know the scow down at the river back of the fort?" answered Pierre, "Well, if the boys could only get aboard it and shove off down current without the Indians knowing, I think it would work out all right."

"But," remarked Cohn, "how can the blamed reds be kept in the dark?"

"Only one way," said Pierre.

"Out with it," said Cohn. "You and I have got to do it. Jack,"

"You and I have got to do it, Jack,"
was the reply.

"I am with you," said Cohn, "but I don't quite catch on to your plan."

"Don't you see," replied Pierre, "if you and I ride out of the fort and go different ways the Indians will be after as. They'll think we're going for reinforcements, and there'll be a big chase, I reckon. You and I would have to ake desperate chances, but our horses are good and we're the only two who know how to play the Indians. What do you think of the scheme?"

"It will work, Pierre: it will work, if only the lieutenant agrees to it. Say we put it to him in the morning."

"It will work, Pierre; it will work, if Then these two brave fellows worked out their plan in detail, and it was this: They were willing to take their lives in their hands and ride out of the fort to livert the attention of the Indians while Lieut. D. and his men slipped out and embarked upon the scows. They did not conceal from each other the risk hey were taking, but they discussed a plan of action which would give them a good chance to escape capture.

They knew that nearly the whole band of Indians would be after them, and if they were taken it meant worse than mere death—it meant torture—but they also knew that it would leave the door of escape open long enough for their comrades to get away from the fort.

Then came the question—which one would take the direction down stream, for both knew that he who rode that way would have the best change of escaping from his pursuers.

Pierre won, and then he said to Cohn,
"Take my horse, Jack. He is longerwinded than yours. It will be a long chase with you and a short one with me.
I'd sooner take your place, Jack," he added, sadly, for they loved each other as brothers, and Pierre knew from experience the risk his friend would run.
But Cohn would not consent to an exchange of horses and expressed his ability to outrun the Indians. So the heroic compact was concluded, and it only remained to obtain the lieutenant's consent and approval.
