It's fun, too," she continued, "waiting on tables for real swells, and I heard Mrs. Judge Burnham complimenting Miss Tucker about getting on with only us school girls for servants, and probably after we left the room Miss Tucker told the whole table about us-how you were sent here for stealing and that I'm the worst girl in the school. "Well," replied Amelia, "I suppose it's true enough. Louise shrugged her shoulders and silent'y ate her fish. She took a piece of gingerbread and ate that, still in silence. Then she said: "I suppose you aren't going to eat your piece?"

Amelia looked longingly at the plate.

"No," she said; "you can have it." Louise took possession of the piece at once. "You must be glad this is the last Friday in Lent," she remarked. "Why did you choose gingerbread to give up anyhow? It's the only decent thing we have to eat. You ought to have given up beans, as I did," she added with a

Just then the housekeeper's voice was heard. "Bring your dishes into the kitchen when your done with 'em, and don't forget to wipe off the table."

Louise's dark thin cheek flushed. "Don't we know enough to wipe off the table, I wonder, without being told every time? What does she think we have been learning this whole last Amelia's dull face flushed. "I shall be glad to see Charlie," she said. "I don't care much about the rest of 'em. But Charlie is cute. He is just learning to talk English, and they say he keeps asking, 'Wen Ammy comin?'"

Here then came a voice from the other side of the hall: "Aren't you through dinner yet? Those girls can't do another bit of work until Amelia does that stitching! And you know, Louise, that those coats all have to be basted before night."

The girls made no reply and the forewoman departed. Louise jumped up, piled the dishes together and started for the kitchen. "You go on up-I'll wipe Amelia shuffled across the diningroom and into the hall. But before she reached the stairs she heard Miss Tucker calling: "Amelia, Amelia Kaufman, there's a letter for you. It came this

For some time there was no sound in the room but the noise of the machine. The four small girls pulled basting threads with the patience of little Jobs. Miss Mix was cutting coats out of rough gray cloth, stopping now and then, her big shears in air, to see that none of the girls were shirking.

Miss Mix was naturally neither sus-picious nor hard hearted; but eight years' experience in the girls department of a reform school had begun to tell on her temper. Especially since Louise Pereau had come her life had been anything but easy. As Miss Tuc-ker had said, "Miss Mix and Louise could never get on from the minute they set eyes on each other." And since Louise was the quicker-witted of the two, Miss Mix suffered more. Yet when Miss Tucker had suggested taking Louise out of the sewing-room Miss Mix had exclaimed "Oh, no, Louise is the only one that knows anything. Do let me keep her!"

It was during one of these glances round the room that there came a rap at the door. "Miss Tucker wants to see you in the office a minute," said the small gray coated messenger.

Miss Mix looked around the room and Miss Mix looked around the room and hesitated. She could see that the little girls had brightened up at the thought of her going out. Then Miss Mix did exactly the wrong thing. She drew a key from her pocket, went out and locked the door behind her. Every girl in the office stopped work immediately.

Louise shook her head. After a moment's consideration she said. "I have factured."

ment's consideration she said. "I have thought of something for which she can't possibly punish us." But nobody ever knew what Louise's plan for mischief was, for just then there came a sob from the direction of the machine. A melic hed and fifty-seven degrees below zero was registed at Werckojansk, Eastern Siberia, in February, 1892. This is the lowest temperature ever registered on the machine. Amelia had dropped her the face of the earth.

Amelia did not answer but sobbed harder. Louise turned to the little girls.

"Go to work," she said, sharply, "what are you fooling around for?" They fell to pulling basting threads in silence. After a minute Amelia said, so low that they could be swept together in piles that only Louise could hear: "Funeral on the floor. at 10:30 to morrow." Adding with a sob, "Charlie's dead."

"Oh dear, dear." murmured Louise, stroking Amelia's harsh, light hair pityingly. "And you can't even go to the funeral—a reform girl can't even go to with all their branches and minute ramifiher own funeral! It's a shame! a

There was the sound of a key in the lock, and the next second the forewoman entered, looking sharply about her. The four little ones were working dili gently. Louise was at her table, and Amelia seemed to be threading the machine needle. Miss Mix took up her shears and began to cut out a sleeve. Amelia's eyes were full of tears, but stitch. There was a little snap, which told Miss Mix's trained ear that another machine needle was broken. Before Miss Mix could speak Louise

Pereau sprang up. "Amelia is sick, ma'am," she said. "Mayn't she go to the dormitory?"

the dormitory?"

Miss Max looked at Louise suspiciously. "I've heard nothing of her feeling ill—I will speak to her myself."

But Louise stood in her path. "Amelia is sick," she repeated. She controlled her feelings and spoke very respectfully. I will do her work," she added.

For a moment Miss Mix hesitated. If Amelia was really ill of course she ought not to work. But she felt Louise Pereau must have some object in the kindness. She looked at her sharply, bringing an angry red into the French girl's cheeks. "You may go up to the dormitory, Amelia, and Lizzie." she added slowly, "you go up with her. And you, Louise, can do Amelia's stitching now and finish your own work after hours."

As Amelia was leaving the room Louise whispered to her: "You had better go right to bed. You know I said you were sick. Then nobody will interrupt you." It was more than an hour past dinnertime at the Industrial School. The long oil cloth covered tables in the students' dining-room were already laid for the near meal, but at the end of the table near the windows stood too plates of picked codish and a large saucer with two squares of gingerbread in it.

Through the open pantry door came the rattle of dishes and now and then the sound of voices. "Be more careful, Louise." called someone, sharply, "you know the pitcher is cracked."

There was no reply, but a moment later a slender, black haired girl came into the dining-room, carrying a pitcher of water in one hand and a dish of boiled potatoes in the other. Setting both down on the table near the gingerbread she stepped to the window and drew down the shade with a jerk.

It would hardly have been necessary to hear Louise Pereau's name to suspect she was French. There was something in the trim figure and in the air of smartness about the pink cotton gown that suggested her nationality.

She seated herself at the table, turning slightly as she heard footsteps.
"Hurry up!" she called.

Amelia Kaufman was not an attractive girl. Her face was stolid, and her light hair, drawn straight up from her forehead and ears, was coiled tightly on top of her head. Her blue gingham skirt sagged behind, and her white apron, which was in reality exactly like ham skirt sagged behind, and her white apron, which was in reality exactly like Louise Pereau's, looked woefully different.

"I'm dead tired," said Amelia. Then she added, "Miss Tucker hadn't any business to ask us to wait on the table. "Taint our work now, and she knows it."

Louise, usually the first to find fault with the school and everybody connected with it, unexpectedly took sides with Miss Tucker:

"Yes, she had, Amelia. She knew there wasn't any other girls could do it fit to be seen. You know the last time the trustees were here Nettie slipped"

an aggravating hesitancy.

Louise ran upstairs to the dormitory. She passed quickly down the row of cots until she came to Amelia's. Laying her hand on the girl's forehead, she said:

"Do you want anything?"

"No," said Amelia, "I can't have anything," Louise tucked her in and then hurried back to the further door, down two flights of back stairs, through the kitchen and dining-room into the office.

"Miss Tucker," she said breathlessly.

"you know I've got a dollar and a half in the safe. I want to take it out."

"I thought," began Miss Tucker, "that you were keeping that—"

"And won't you," interrupted Louise, "telephone to Sanborn's for him to make up the handsomest wreath he can for a dollar and a quarter and send it right up here, please, in a good box?"
"What for, Louise?" said Miss Tucker in astonishment. "And if you spend your money you won't get your white dress at all. You musn't do it." "Please, Miss Tucker," said the girl 'Amelia feels dreadful about her little brother that's just died. She can't go herself, you know, I can't wait," she added looking anxiously toward the door, "but if you would take the wreath up as soon as it comes and show it to Amelia, I would be very much obliged. She will tell you where it is to go, and my other twenty-five cents in the safe is for William to pay the express charges. And if you would just as soon not say anything to Miss Mix.

"Well," said Miss Tucker, in a low voice, "I will see that it goes to-night, though I really do think-" But Louise was already on her way back to the sewing-room, following the same roundabout path by which she had to give it up," thought Miss Tucker as she rang the telephone bell. Louise sewed until supper time, went into the evening school and studied until 9 o'clock; then she went to the dormitory with the other girls. Pausing beside Amelia's bed she asked, "Did Mrs. Goodnow send up your supper?"

"Yes," replied a smothered voice from under the bed clothes. Then the voice added: "You're awfully good, Louise." That was all the thanks Amelia could think of, but it let Louise know she had The next day work went on in the usual humdrum fashion. Amelia stitched what Louise basted, and the little girls pulled out the basting threads. But Louise had kept her Lent and made her sacrifices, and when the sun rose brightly on Easter morning it brought to "the worst girl in school" something of the gladness of the day.

Miss Mix would have preferred to refuse. She always felt when Louise was in the room as if conspiracy was thick in the air. She granted permission with an aggravating hesitancy.

She suffered with intense pain in the stomach after eating, which was usually followed by the smothering sensation about the heart and fainting spells. She tried a great many remedies and was treated by the doctors for some time, but obtained no relief. She became so discouraged that she gave up all hope of ever getting better, when our pastor suggested that she try HAWKER'S NERVE AND STOMACH TONIC and LIVER PILLS, which had produced remarkable cures in several cases he knew of. We did so and she obtained immediate relief from the distress after taking the second dose, and has continued to improve ever since until today she is as well as ever, and can enjoy her food without fear of suffering.
