Miramichi Advance.

CHATHAM, N. B., JANUARY 4, 1894. OVER THE TRESTLE.

Orin Wakely was a young mechanic who had "lost his job" only a few days after he had married the prettiest girl in the little manufacturing town where he lived. He argued rather shrewdly that the loss of his place was or might be owing to the influence of a rejected rival, and was related by ties of blood to the senior member of the firm that had employed him, for Henry Collier had taken Frank Ayres' refusal to be his wife very much to heart.

Though invited to the simple wedding, he had not only remained away, but had said some hard and bitter things, and while under the influence of liquor had thrown out vague threats of future revenge. There are always officious "friends" who carry tales under such circumstances. Orin was not slow to hear the remarks which Collier had passed, but was too happy to give much heed to them. When, however, on the next day he, among others, was "let off" with the assurance that it was "necessary" to reduce the force, "though it had always been the custom to retain married men, he could not help but remember them. To attempt to find employment in his trade at a time when all manufacturing interests were at so low an ebb seemed almost useless.

Things began to look very dark indeed before any opportunity whatever came to him. Orin had begun his search for work by having some choice as to what he would do. He ended it by taking the only position he could get.

He was acquainted with one of the officials of a railroad extension which had recently been authorized, and he had been in the town in which he lived. Upon being applied to this man had interested himself sufficiently in Orin's case to get for him the humble position of track-walker at a very important point on the road some 50 miles away. A primitive cottage had been built in a romantic looking spot, so far as nature was concerned, but which in desolate looking one as human nature, accustomed to the busy life of a town, might view it.

This cottage near the railway was for the conductor of the track, or rather the bridge-walker and his family, for the section of the road placed under Orin's care ran over a trestle-work bridge, built entirely of wood, 45 or 50 feet high, and three-quarters of a mile in length, extending over the dry bottom of what was known under the euphonious title of Mosquito lake. The trestle-work was so constructed in walking over this trestle, after the passage of each train, night and day. He was to look carefully as to whether or not a locomotive might have lodged in some crevice among the trestle timbers, and if so extinguish it.

At intervals along the track small platforms, supported by the extended ties, held stationary barrels filled with water. In each barrel was a pail, or "bucket," with which the water might be dipped up.

Fannie yielded gracefully to the inevitable, and with her little store of home belongings, made, Orin declared, "the wildest to blossom like the rose." At the rate, the little cot was theirs free of rent. The pay for the position, with the garden Orin made, would feed them, and their clothes would last, perhaps, until the dawning of more prosperous days.

Day after day Orin walked over the high trestle, and every night in the wake of the flying train might be seen his dark figure on its lonely height. If the moon did not shine and it was very dark, he sometimes took with him his lantern, but he explained to Fannie that a spark could be seen to better advantage in the dark.

The poor girl always felt nervous when he went out in the night without his lantern. "You might make a misstep and fall," urged she.

"No danger," he laughingly replied, "when one keeps in the middle of the road."

One day when the Wakelys had been domiciled in their new home for some married nearly 18 years. Come late in the afternoon, and Fannie, sitting sewing by her little front window, cast her eyes carelessly toward the high trestle, thinking how strange the providence that had brought them there.

A man was passing along the ties. She drew back suddenly; then bent forward to look again. It was certainly Henry Collier. What could have brought him there? Did it portend any evil to Orin?

While she looked the man walked on and passed out of sight. When she could see him no longer, he started fears subsided. He was probably there on business of his own, which had no reference to Orin or herself. Still she hesitated to mention the circumstances to her husband, knowing how intensely and with what good reason he disliked Henry Collier.

That night, shortly after the train had thundered by, Orin started out into the darkness to follow over the trestle. At night's length subsided in daylight became active once more. Fannie related the circumstances of Henry Collier's passage over the trestle and could not be still. She arose and dressed herself, lighted Orin's lantern, took the revolver he had long kept, and climbing up the bank set out to follow him. The wind was strong, and Fannie was timid. Her passage at first was slow. But presently she saw not far away a flame spring up, small and slender, fanned by the wind. She forgot her timidity. Her feet flew onward as if upheld by mercurial wings. She sped ahead of her, between her and the blaze, two wrestling forms. She heard oaths and execrations, and her husband's voice crying out:

"Villain! Scoundrel! Would you burn the bridge? Would you throw me over?"

She flew past them like the wind, reached the water barrel, and flooded out the incipient blaze of light combustibles heaped near it. Then, setting down the lantern, she sprang like an angry tigress at her husband's assailant, presenting the cold muzzle of the weapon she carried to his head, demanding that he would fire, or surrender, or she would fire.

Henry Collier was cowed at heart. He feared the righteous anger of this infuriated wife. His hands fell at his side. He submitted to have them tied behind him with the long scarves Fannie wore about her head. Under the persuasive influence of Fannie's leveled revolver (which she never had fired) and Orin's urgent assistance he was marched back to the cottage, where he was held in duress until morning, when Fannie walked the trestle herself, while Orin took him to the county seat, delivered him into the authorities, and he was lodged in jail. He is now serving a long term for arson in the Ohio penitentiary.

The railroad company acknowledges Fannie's heroic conduct by a gift of numerous shares of stock in the road, and Orin's faithful defense of their property by a promotion worthily earned.—Minnie W. Baines-Miller in Cincinnati Post.

AN ILLUSION.

Frank Bedford is the queerest fellow I ever met. We were at school together and have been chums ever since. Frank has one great failing—he is always falling in love. He first fell victim to the charms of one schoolmaster's daughter. He was 10 and she 16 and a sensible girl for her age. I thought, by the way in which she spoke to Frank when he declared his passion to her. He was always a precocious boy. He told Ada he loved her to distraction. She cut him short by kissing him and telling him he was a dear little boy. Then she gave him a quarter to buy candies, but told him not to make himself sick!

Poor Frank! His feelings were greatly wounded. He had the queer notion that his heart was possible—for a few weeks, and at the end of that time he was desperately in love with some one else.

These little fancies of Frank's never lasted very long, for he was a great admirer of beauty, so that if he happened to admire Rose because she had pretty hair, he suddenly discovered that Fanny had

Hotel New Netherland. FIFTH AVENUE, CENTRAL PARK AND 59th ST., NEW YORK.

The most elegant, the safest, the strongest and most complete hotel of the world. On the European plan, with a grand restaurant, fresh air and pure water. Artificial ice and cold storage.

Every parlor, lobby, bath room and clothes closet scientifically ventilated, rendering it absolutely impossible for impure air to accumulate, thus making all rooms delightfully cool, even in the hottest weather, and unknown in other hotel construction.

Every plumbing or outfit being vented from the roof open to the atmosphere, thus insuring perfect ventilation, and removing all organic matter from the water which is held in suspension and physical solution, not at the same time thoroughly disinfecting and deodorizing the water during purification, thereby rendering it a product equal to the finest chemically distilled water, pure and sparkling, without the aid of chemicals in any form whatsoever.

All rooms of every description, into clothes closets, are lighted by electricity, thus avoiding the violation caused by gas and the danger of its halting flame.

The hotel is more thoroughly fire-proof than any other building ever constructed, no wood being used except for cabinet purposes.

Steam boilers outside of the building. Remington Typewriters and operators furnished. Long distance telegraph, and telegraph office, when desired. Individual sales for each guest in office.

One block from the Sixth Avenue Elevated railroad station. Fifth Avenue stages and Fifty-Ninth Street Crossovers, and the Metropolitan Opera House, the Casino, the New Broadway Theatre and the new Empire Theatre.

The main feature of the Hotel is that it is absolutely fire-proof. The floor and roof beams are all of iron, and the floor is of fire-proof brick arches, with a concrete base.

The sanitary arrangements have been made a special feature by constant sanitary engineers. Every room is connected by direct speaking tubes with the office, and guests will be able to announce their names, or give orders to the office, ascertain the status and guests of callers, etc., without having to enter the office, or when a guest declines to leave his room, by notifying the office, the room can be connected with a system of alarms, so that no one can enter it by the door, the window or skylight, without the fact being announced in the office, also, fire alarm signals in every room and to the Metropolitan Fire Department.

The hotel contains 200 rooms, an suite and single, fire alarm signals in every room and to the Metropolitan plan, with a restaurant, café and saloon of peculiar excellence.

Special arrangements made to families. Rooms range from $2.50 per day and upwards.
