A RAINY DAY.

A dull gray sky and dull brown earth, And the dreary, steady rain, The shadows grow deeper within the room;

A fly creeps over the pane. Trees stand still and lifeless and dull, The raindrops cling to the leaves; A lonely sparrow, rolled up in a ball

Chirps drearily under the eaves. he sweet blush roses hang their heads, Heavy and dripping with rain; A butterfly trails the limp, white wings

He never will use again.

The long lush grass, with foam-like fringe, Lies tangled on the ground, And the rain's sad, deadening spell has hushed Each tiny insect sound.

A dull gray sky and a steady rain And shadows dim up-piled, And out of the darkness and sadness rings The laugh of a little child

A WOMAN'S WIT.

Well, good-by, old fellow. Enjoy yourself and don't lose your heart to the pretty fish girls.'

"Good-by, Ted, dear. Please write to me as often as you can. With Ralph away as well as you I shall be rather

The speakers were my friend Ralph Shirley, head clerk at Messrs. Carter's bank, a careworn man of five and forty. with grizzled hair and a pre-occupied expression, and his pretty little step-sister Kate, aged 24, my affianced wife.

The time was 10 o'clock on an August morning; the place, Charing Cross station, the departure platform of the Folkestone train, in which I, Edward Pierrepoint, aged twenty-five, was seated, on my way to enjoy my brief holiday at the "beautiful Boolong; the place for the stranger who's done something

In this case, however, I myself had done nothing wrong, although at the moment I was a good deal troubled concerning the wrong-doing of others. Two nights before Ralph had communicated to me, under oath of secrecy, a very startling piece of information. A certain fast young nobleman, the marquis of —, had more than a year ago, procured from Messrs. Carter's bank an advance of twenty-five thousand pounds, upon the security of certain famous pearls, which he had inherited from his mother, a Russian

The pearls were reputed to be worth fifty thousand, and were duly lodged in Messrs. Carter's strong room, with every possible precaution. Within the past fortnight, however, it had come to the knowledge of Messrs. Carter that, by an extraordinary exercise of ingenuity and cunning the locks of the strong room and safes had been tampered with, and a portion of the jewelry, amounting to between fifteen and twenty thousand pounds, had disap-

The loss was not, so far, known to the remainder of the staff. But Ralph Shirley, who had entered the bank as a boy, and had grown gray in its service, was admitted into the secrets of the firm. She look I had for three years lodged in Ralph's house at Clapham, and as his closest friend and his stepsister's future husperhaps, confided the secret of the loss of the pearls to me.

The shock had affected him strongly. He considered the honor of the bank as his own, as was but natural after his long service. He was even somewhat shocked and pained at my determination, in the face of such news, to take my annual holiday as though nothing had hap ing pearls." pened.

He himself was going down to Somersetshire. But that was in order to make | lock and thrust her telegram under the private inquiries concerning the antecedents of one of our clerks whom Messrs. Carter had reason to suspect of trifling acts of dishonesty.

In about a quarter of an hour's time a deep drawn sigh from my companion | was found to contain five times as much drew my attention to her. She had chemical impurities as is supposed to be raised her veil, and was staring out of the limit for safe drinking. It is this the window with a look of pensive sad- well which is the cause of so much ness, which, in one so beautiful, went | cholera in the far East. straight to my heart.

She lcoked like the heroine of a three volume novel of the "intense" order. Her hair, under her very becoming widow's bonnet, was of a peculiar bright auburn; her eyes were gray and singularly brilliant, her lashes long and jetty black. Her complexion was extremely pale and transparent, aud her voice, as she asked me presently whether I minded having the window down, completed my subjection. It was a most delicious voice; of a particularly caressing quality that at once appealed to the softest side of a young man's nature.

Poor thing! Her tale was a sad one, as I soon learned. Left a widow six months ago by the sudden death of her husband, a hard-working East End curate, she was now on her way to Paris, in order to take a position as governess to a wealthy French family, acquaintances of the Rothschilds.

Stella Dale realized my ideal of womanhood. The interest she took in me | week. was extraordinary. She seemed never tired of asking me the minutest questions as to how I spent my time, who were my chief companions, etc. As an excuse for her curiosity she owned, with modest tenderness, that I had inspired in her a very deep interest. She wished, she playfully told me, being several years older than I, to be my Lady Confessor, and she very speedily got out of me all that there was to tell, with which, however, she seemed hardly satisfied. "I want your fullest confidence, dear Edward," she said, with an angelic

I hailed a cab and followed the carriage. It stopped before one of the largest and most expensive hotels in Paris. I jumped out and laid my hand upon Ralph's arm as he too descended. "Ralph," I said, quietly, "I must speak to you." He looked at me vacantly for a mo-

"Don't tell Kate," he said, "and don't ask me what made me do it. It was coming on for a whole year-that feeling that the pearls were there, doing nobody any good, and that I knew how to get at them. No one suspected me. I've led a dog's life of dreary routine and tremendous responsibility for five and twenty years. I've got heart disease I know it, and I told myself I wanted just once to know what 'life,' as they call it, was like before I was snuffed out like a candle. Well, it's a miserable failure, Ted. Money, luxury, gay society, as it's called-I've had a week of it all; I don't want any more. Do I repent? No. why should I? I wasn't going out of the world without knowing something about it. Wait; I'll give you the rest of the pearls and the addresses of the places where the others were taken. Also my confession. I prepared that beforehand, lest this heart trouble should take me off.
