SISTER CLAIRE.

A Roman sunset. The bells from all parts of the Eternal City were pealing out the "Ave Maria." Rome is a city of churches and fountains. One can never escape from the musical plash of the latter, or the voices of the former voices which are as varied in their accents as there are ears to interpret them, from the clanging, dogmatic peal which says: "Go—do your duty, I command!" to the silvery toned chime which says: "Come, come away from the strife and tumult of the world, and listen to the Divine melody, the angels' song.' The crowd which had assembled to listen to the music was slowly dispers-

Just before leaving the garden, two American ladies were talking together, near the Fountain of Moses. "I wonder if she will sing the solo today," said one; "it is a special feast, you see, and the music ought to be extra good. I am just aching to hear this

Sister Claire. "Yes; she is perfectly splendid," re-—some of those pathetic things.

There is a sort of wail in her voice, like—well, like what an Æolian harp must make, I imagine! It saddens me to hear her sing, and yet I think it is that which attracts me,

"They say she was trained professionally," said the first speaker, "and there is a romance in her life." "A love trouble, I guess!—and now they have shut her up in a convent. Well, it is a shame. Why, that woman, with that voice, might have been a regular tip-top singer by now! But I reckon that is why she draws a big crowd here; a spice of romance will always draw folks—it's human, you

"Why, no, Carrie, it can't be that, quite," rejoined the first speaker. "It is not generally known, but I heard her story through my old padrona at Perugia, when I was there last autumn sketching, before coming on to Rome. Old Battista's sister had been a servant old Battista's sister had been a servant in the family, and a rather confidential one, too, I reckon. The family was noble, and half French; at least, the Signorina's mother had been a French-woman, but at her death the father married again, beneath him. Some years after he died also, and the family were awfully poor—as they always are, these Italian small nobles—not a red cent! The Signorina was very heanti-White and Grey Blankets,

He went away to make a name in the world, but swore to return and claim her; and the girl refused to give him up, or to wed any other. Indeed, old Battista hinted that they had been privately married. The Signorina was steadfast in her love, and things might have come straight, but for the money. It appears that it was to have been equally divided-a large dowry going to the girl and the Signora wanted it all for her son; so a conspiracy was hatched be-tween mother, son, and her maid—Bat-tista's sister. They forged letters, and tried to make the poor girl believe that her lover was false to her, and, failing that, that he was dead. The plot succeeded, and the broken-hearted girl consented—almost plead, indeed—to enter a convent, and their avarice was gratified, for they inherited all but the small dowry given with her. In due time the lover returned to claim her, and found her, as he thought, false to her love! What's that? It sounded like a groan. I declare these ilex trees make me nervous! What was I saying? Oh, yes—the lover returned to claim his fiancee or wife—and found her lost to him, for the convent bar was as effectual as the tomb. "Oh, they made out a good case for themselves, showing him letters to prove that she desired only the religious life, longed for the peace of the cloister, etc.; putting it all down to repentance—the sighing of a penitent soul to make her salvation. Not a word of the truth. He was almost broken hearted, but his anger, too, was terrible. 'Tell her she may save her own soul, but she has damned mine!' he cried bitterly; and then he went away, and was heard of no more. Battista's sister, who repented her part, confessed it all to her on her deathbed; but I do not know what became of the others—they left the neighborhood. It all happened years ago, but Sister Claire is still here, and no doubt, Battista says, the poor dove spends all her life in prayers for his soul, for she still thinks him dead. Now, is it not "Yes; I am really glad to know it. I shall take ever so much more interest in her singing now. But talking of singing reminds me to ask you if you went to hear Alvaro when you were in

"No, I was sick, and, although we had tickets for him, I had to stay at home. I was sorry to miss him."
"I want to hear him, too," said her friend; "but come along, we are quite late. Why, what a handsome man!" indicating a tall, dark figure, which was moving rapidly away under the trees. "Yes, indeed! he looks like a brigand Carrie." And truly his swarthy darkness did not belie the comparison.

He wore one of the long, fur-lined pelisses common to the Italian of all ranks, but distinguished in the higher by its superiority in materials. His wide-brimmed slouch hat shaded a farms. countenance whose regular features, and deep, flashing eyes, were well cal-culated to strike the observant foreign eye, ever ready to admire the bei typi Italini. He had been leaning against one of the trees behind the bench on which the friends had been seated, sufficiently near to startle them by his rapid movement when he withdrew further into

'The man gave me quite a start, gliding off like that, and so close to us, too; but one never thinks of these folks listening to one, or understanding what one says, and I was not saying anything bad; was I Carrie?" And then the two friends hurried away anocenta!" he murmured, hoarsely, "Innocenta!"

In the church of the Trinita de Monti all was warmth and melody. The "dim religious light," the odor of the incense, the sweet-voiced choir, stole into the heart, and made one feel that it was good to be there. Behind the tall screen one could catch a glimpse of the dark-robed sisters, and the white veiled forms of the pension-Before the screen, in the body of the church, were crowded the worshippers, a strange mixture of nationalities and creeds, united in one respect-their love of church in Rome where strangers behave It was the feast of St. John, and the music was very fine. The chorus of mingled voices had just died away in the little west gallery, behind whose screen the singers take their places, and now rung out, in clear, full tones, the rich voice of the sister soloist. Higher it soared, and still higher, softening exquisitely in the dolcissimmo passages, and descending in almost a wailing sweetness, as if the singer was throwing the whole force of her soul into the glorious music. That was the great secret of her power, an intense capacity of sympathy with sorrow, suffering—even sin. It was the cry, made tuneful, of suffering but aspiring humanity. The great audience swayed like the reeds when swept by the autumn wind. One or two nervous, excited women were sobbing. Again the clear voice rang out, with a thrill like that in the tuneful throat of the nightingale, throbbing and expanding in ecstasy of mel-ody, when suddenly it was joined by another-deep, full, majestic-which rose in that wave of melody to meet it, until they mingled and fused in a glorious harmony. It had a startling effect, the sisters below almost lifting their heads; the pensionnaires doing so outright.

The listening crowd was thrilled by an entirely unexpected sensa-tion. Who could it be? Was it an arranged thing? It lasted all too short a time, for the grand tenor ceased as the soprano's voice died away in the final "Amen," rising suddenly at the last note with a wailing cry—was it a cry to man or God? Then there was a hush, a holding one's breath; in their dark corner our two American friends were whispering together, for your American is always more touched by curiosity than pathos. "How curious! Carrie, there is that man again! I wonder"—but their voices were drowned in the continuation of the Above, in the dark choir, there had been a slight pause, and in the final chorus Sister Claire's voice was not heard. The service ended, calmly, as usual, but none below had seen the darkrobed little figure sink on the floor at the close of that agonized Amen, the white lips dabbled with blood, the limbs rigid. Two sisters carried her out. Sister Claire had broken a blood vessel—too high a pitch-too great a strain-"Chi

The feelings of a nun are subordinate to her office; it was necessary that the service should be finished discreetly, and Sister Claire's work was done! The audience dispersed, still wondering who it could have been. Some said one thing, some another: the Italian element shrugged their shoulders as they said: "It is a thing extraordinary, no doubt," ending with the customary "Chi lo sa?" (Who can

One man, a French chorus singer, said to a woman as they walked away, "It was Alvaro, or his spirit. No one else could sing like that!" To the sisterhood it was as the voice of an angel-it was miraculous! The two friends stood outside one of the high houses of Via Sistina. "Oh! Carrie, I do feel so bad!" said one; "it was that voice; and then that facethough I only saw it for an instant!" "Come up with me and have some tea," was her friend's reply. "Why,

The deep hush of an Italian night. The midnight Angelus had rung out and floated upwards, bearing the prayers of those who woke from the sleeping city. Only the plash of falling water broke the stillness—the one voice which in Rome is never silent. On the terrace below the church of the Trinita, a dark figure was pacing, straining his eyes upward to the silent

"I am with you in spirit, oh! my be loved! Innecenta, my Innocenta!' The drip, drip of the fountain fell on "It is like blood," he murmured, and he shuddered; but his face grew darker. There was a lapse of moments-a quarter of an hour-then the man fell on his knees with a great cry. "Innocenta-beloved one-at last!" In the convent above the nuns were on their knees in the office for the dead. She had been unconscious nearly all the time, but once she murmured softly to herself. A watching sister bent to listen, catching only the final word, "It is the patron saint of her family;" and the sister placed a small reliquary in the nerveless hands. "San Giovanni, ora pro nobis!" "Yes, it is her patron saint." Perhaps! There was a pause of a few moments, during which the pale lips were moving silently—then a long, quivering sigh—and the soul of Innocenta Peruzzi-Sister Claire -had followed her song! MISSING LINKS.
