THE TALL MAN.

At the end of twenty-four hours, which seemed terribly long, to the prisoner, he was relieved from his painful position. His colonel read to him all the obligations imposed upon him as a soldier, and the punishment ordered for a breach of them; the unconditional obedience to his superiors was especially represented as a most sacred duty. Lane was then for the first time allowed to join his comrades in the guard which was kept in the royal castle, near the person of the monarch. Lane's costume consisted of a blue uniform with red facings, white cloth breeches tucked into high boots reaching to the knees, a long red waistcoat and a grenadier cap, which had in front of it a tall shining brass sheet ending in a peak. It was a beautiful sight, those gigantic well-made and welf-disciplined soldiers, in their long well-ordered ranks, marching past with firm and echoing steps and glittering arms, with the beating of drums and the sound of fifes. All the passers-by paused, and others came up to stare at and admire the world-renowned tall body-guard of the Prussian king. The men were afterwards told off and sent to the posts assigned them.

Lane with one of his comrades was placed near the back entrance of the castle, and had to watch the castle itself, the surrounding country, and the people of Berlin, for two hours. When he was relieved he was permitted to rest for four hours in the guard-room; after which he had to stand sentry again, so that he was on duty four times during the four-and-twenty hours. He received every day for his subsistence two pounds of black bread, and eightteen-pence pay. That was not much for so large and strong a man, who had been accustomed to earn eighteen dollars a day. Nevertheless he stinted himself to save sixpence in order (as soon as he was allowed to leave the barracks) to purchase a sheet of letterpaper, a pen and some ink. When he asked for these articles in a shop, he was told to his great distress that it was strictly forbidden to sell writing materials to a life-guardsman.

"Well, I must try another way," said Lane, and he left the shop, and a moment after asked a little street boy to get him what he required, while he would wait a little distance off. The first lad he asked laughed in his face, and said, "You are a life-guardsman, and I should find myself in a nice mess were I to buy you pen, ink and paper. You can go to the shop just as well as I A second boy was more obliging, or appeared to be so. He took the money and went to the shop; but Lane waited in vain for his return, and was at last convinced that the boy had run away. The loss of sixpence troubled the once wealthy merchant more than the loss of six hundred dollars would have done formerly, but he would not be discouraged by these failures, and at last he succeeded in obtaining the necessary materials. He was, therefore, obliged to moonlight, after taking care to ascertain that all his comrades were sound asleep. He did not dare to light a candle, for the sentries in the yard would have given an alarm had they perceived the faintest glimmering of light; moreover, there was a glass window to the door of every room, through which the barrack inspectors, making their rounds in the galleries, could observe all that was going on. Poor Lane then was driven to great straits how to accomplish his object. At last he decided to lie down and pretend to be asleep, writing meanwhile, as well as he could, in a recumbent position, and in imminent danger of upsetting his precious ink !

At last, after much precaution and delay, he contrived to indite the following almost illegible letter: "MY DEARLY LOVED WIFE: This is indeed my hand writing, though you may have some difficulty in recognizing mer, the drill-sergeant. When at last were a matter of course, and that he it. I was kidnapped by Prussian emissaries, and conveyed to Berlin, where I was placed in the king's regiment of life-guards. I am now in the barracks. We were forbidden to write or send letters, and no one dare sell us pen, ink, or paper. On that day when last saw you I received at dusk a letterfrom our friend Darn, of Mayence, imploring me to come to him at the inn at Oppach, as he had an important matter to confide to me. I went, but the letter was a forgery. When I reached Oppach a man asked me for the sake of charity to assist him with a traveling carriage, which was in great danger. I went with him. He led me a little out of the road, and there a traveling carriage lay on its side. Two men begged us to try and lift it. As I stooped to assist, many strong arms were thrown around me. I was dragged to the ground, and before I could even struggle, a pitch-plaster was put over my face, which nearly suffocated me. My arms and legs were tied with ropes. Other men who had been concealed behind the carrage, helped to thrust me inside. Three men came into the carriage with me, the door was shut, and we drove off. The plaster was removed. for I had become insensible; but I was told, the least cry for help and it would be replaced. We traveled rapidly, and found relays of fresh horses every few miles. We never stopped to rest. I was not allowed to leave the carriage, and they gave me nothing to eat or drink until after we reached the Prussian frontier, and there we waited a short time. At last we reached this place. I am now changed into the lifeguardsman Lane, in the fourth company, under Captain Von Seidwitz. My corporal's name is Wimmer; he is our drillmaster. Our barracks are in Charlotte Strasse. I occupy room No 13. I entreat you to make every effort to obtain my liberty. The hope of one day seeing you again, and my mother and my children, alone gives me courage to endure this life. But I put my trust in God, the Preserver of all. Kiss my mother and Adolphus and little Dietrich and the baby for their loving father and and your loving husband, "LIBRECHT HIEBENDAHL (now called Lane)." Now that the letter with great labor was written, his next difficulty was how to get it posted. He did not dare to do it himself, for a life-guardsman's letter would be sure to be stopped. The address, too, was a difficulty. The authorities might have received orders to lay aside all letters bearing the name of Hiebendahl, to Frankfort-on-the-Maine. So he directed it to his most intimate acquaintance, Herr Roemer, a merchant a gold-headed stick. His countenance child," said the mother, who was helpin Frankfort. "Who gave you this letter to post?" "My cousin can tell you."

"What is your cousin?" "A market servant."

The official said no more, but he made a cross upon the letter with red chalk, and threw it into a separate box. The little messenger returned to Lane and told him the letter had been taken

Lane felt happy; he counted the days and hours till Agnes should receive it. It never occurred to him that it might never reach her hands!

Spring had come round with its fresh green leaves, its singing birds, and all its delights, but they brought no joy to Lane. Like the captive birds that beat themselves against the wires of their cage, Lane felt desperate, and tempted to put an end to his misery by sword away with fear. or musket. His fate seemed too dreadful to be borne. Week after week passed, but no tidings of his beloved ones reached him. He had written several letters, all of which had reached the post-office, but he expected the reply in vain. The hopes he indulged made the heart-sickness of longing too heavy to endure. He was isolated in king. his misery, for none of the other soldiers seemed to feel any longing for release; and yet most of them had, like himself, been kidnapped from their homes and families. They, however, seemed not only merry and light-hearted, but proud of their regiment, and proud of belonging to the famous life-guards of Prussia. The grand review, which the king always held in Spring, was now drawing near, and the life-guards had to go through extra drill. It was during these drills that it could be seen what the will of man can accomplish. There stood, as though measured by a line, right or the left at the word of command, as if touched by a spring. bestowed on him, though he was dimly One word, and the five hundred heads were directed to the same point; a thousand feet moved like those of one man. Then again they stood motionless ; five hundred muskets were raised, shouldered. reversed, and placed with the butt-end against the ground. One effort, one blow, made them rattle in the same measured time. But what innumerable drills, and repetitions of each of those evolutions, had each of these five hundred men gone through before attaining

Once it happened that the butt-end of one of the muskets had been a second behind the rest in touching the ground. The colonel strode up to the dilatory guardsmen and gave him a cut on his helmet with the sharp edge of his sword. The weapon slipped off the grenadier's cap and cut through his ear, which bled, and the blood covered his neckcloth and the collar of his uniform. "Captain Von Siedwitz!" shouted the colonel, "what is the name of this fellow who threatens to bring disgrace upon the whole regiment before his Majesty? Beat him with the flat of your sword, that he may learn to move scrawl his letter in his barrack-room by his lazy bones quicker. Let him do extra drill till he can neither see nor hear. So he resolved to speak to the king when it came to his turn to be questioned. The king approached. A shudder passed over the strong man, but he held to his resolution. A strange incident drew his attention from himself at that moment. The third man to the left of

"How old are you, then?" said the

"One year!" answered La Fleche, making game of him; his anger was roused; and with a terrible look and gesture he thundered out to La Fleche, who saw that something was wrong:

"Are you an idiot? "Yes!" said the Frenchman, solemnly, exactly as he had been taught. At this last reply the king turned hastily away towards his staff of generals and officers, who could scarcely be restrained, even by the presence of the king, from a shout of laughter as he told them the extraordinary replies he had received.

He asked no more questions that day, and Lane saw with a pang of despair his five hundred gigantic men, ranged in opportunity of speaking to the king long ranks, moved quick or slow, to the pass away. Wimmer stormed every thing at La Fleche, who was fortunately quite unconscious of the fine names aware that his attempt to speak German had somehow been unsuccessful. Captain Von Siedwitz, who had been summoned to the king, abused Wimmer on his return; but, beyond hard swearing, SKIN-DISEASES, nothing was done, and La Fleche continued to be a life-guardsman as before. The life of the soldiers, even those of the much-favored regiment of the guards, was frugal even to privation. Eighteen-pence a day was very little to buy food sufficient for such gigantic oodies, and Lane in addition to his other sorrows, had often to go hungry. He began like others of his comrades to cast about for some thing to do by which he might earn a little money. He was a man of education, and even his sorrows and his transformation had not destroyed his memory. He could write, and of course book-keeping was his second nature; he could speak French and other languages fluently, as well as read them, and gladly would he have given lessons, or even his services, but there was no opportunity. At last a chance came, for which "necessity, which breaks iron," made him thankful.

In Berlin, at the season when there is a general change of residence on the part of the inhabitants, able-bodied porters are in great request. One day the mother of the little boy, Wilhelm, who had often shown Lane kindness, came into the barracks and said, with an air of patronage:

"Listen Lane; there was a gentlemen here just now enquiring for two guardsmen to help to move his furniture from one house to another.
