THE TALL MAN.

In the meantime the bridal pair ha left the carriage and had gone into the vestry, whence they soon after proceeded to the altar, where the clergyman was awaiting them.

There was an appearance of considerable uneasiness in the circle of spectators. Half-whispered questions respecting some one who was absent; a noisy search for him; voices calling to each other, and mutual exhortations to speedy action, were audible.

It was indeed time that something should be done, for the clergyman had already got as far as the question whether any one could state any impediment to the marriage of the pair before

Then a man of herculean form stepped out of the crowd. It was Hiebendahl's former market-servant, Sie gart, dressed in his working clothes, with a leathern apron and bare arms: hs said, in a deep bass voice-

"Is it not true, your reverence, that a woman can not marry as long as her first husband is alive, unless she has been divorced from him? Now my dear old master, Herr Hiebendahl, whom may God long preserve, is not dead; he was not drowned in the Maine, as it was represented." An exclamation from the bride interrupted the speaker. "He lies! He is drunk!" shouted the enraged Blitterman. "That will be seen," replied Siegart, quietly. "My old master is not lying buried at Bingen, but is standing as sentry at Berlin, to which place a Prussian recruiting party conveyed him by force; he has sent many letters, one after another to his wife, his mother. and his friends, but some villain has

"Ha! he has disappeared; after having befooled a credulous crowd who were to shoot the poisoned arrows for him. And who are all those people "Oh, what joy, if my dear Librecht is around us? Common people, servants, clerks, workmen, who were deservedly dischaged from Frau Hiebendahl's house, and are therefore glad to assist the boy's scheme. Rouse yourself, my beloved wife, and by giving me your dear hand, put an end to the wicked designs of those who are enemies to us both; and you, reverend sir, please to proceed with the sacred ceremony."

"If you really are unable to bring forward any further proof," said the clergyman to Siegart, "I can not discontinue the sacred ceremony which I have been called upon to perform. What does the bride say !"

Agnes had been restored to consciousness, though still weak from the shock she had received. She replied in a decided tone, "No-oh, no, I can nor!"

"What!" said Blitterman, reproachfully, "can you really be so weak as to put any faith in these shameful scandals? to allow our enemies to triumph What will your good mother say? Your refusal to have the marriage ceremony proceeded with may cause her death. Rouse yourself, dear Agnes, and think of your children!"

"I CAN NOT; IT IS IMPOSSIBLE! would rather die; where is Bertram Oh! bring him here," exclaimed the

The bridegroom gave way to another fit of rage. His glaring eyes look round for some one on whom be might vent his exasperation.

All around were prepared to with stand any attack from him. In the meantime one of Hiebendahl's former clerks approached the agitated bride.

"Permit me," he said, in a friendly manner, as he offered her his arm, "to conduct you to your carriage. This is not the place for further revelations. All will be explained at home, and I hope to your satisfaction."

Agnes thankfully accepted the offer, and, accompanied by the crowd, left the church and entered the carriage, which set off without waiting for Blitterman, who, devoured by rage, was slowly following. The crowd hastened after it, and those among them who had formerly been connected with the house as servants or friends made their way into it. When the bridegroom, who was coming after them, saw this, he went hastily away, but soon returned with a lawyer to take his part.

In the meantime all the persons who were formerly in Hiebendahl's service, and had been turned off by Blitterman, arrived, and laid their complaints and accusations before the bride.

The complainants increased in number as the report spread of the scene which had taken place in the church, and they all lamented that the two

I went first to Herr Dipport, as he lived the nearest, and told him my news as rapidly as I could. He seemed to believe me, and bade me follow him to another room where he had a friend who knew my uncle. I followed him into a low, dark room, at the back of the house-there was no one in it; he said he would call him to consult with us, and he went away, locking the door, and did not return. In vain I knocked and shouted; no one come. I spent the whole night in the dark; I was nearly dead with hunger and thirst.
