GOING TO THE BAD.

BY EDMUND YATES.

CHAPTER XVII .- THE MASKED BALL. The statement which Wilbur Hove had made in his letter to his friend, Colonel Willamette, that Lady Randall had left her husband's house, was sub stantially correct. So soon as the acute portion of Minnie's illness was over, so soon as he sense returned to her, and with that recollection of the outrage to which she had been subjected, she felt it impossible to hold any further relations, or even to remain beneath the same roof with one who had treated her with such brutality.

It was a curious characteristic in this young girl's nature, that in this tearing away of the veil from before her eyes, in this shattering of the idol which she had hitherto so fondly worshiped, her feelings underwent an entire revolution. The yielding softness with which she had hitherto borne her husband's neglect and objurgations, was changed into hard, implacable determination; the fond, clinging love, amounting almost to worship, with which she had regarded him, became a positive loathing, exhibited so strangely, that the kindly watchers by her bedside found it advismention of his name or any allusion to

It was Kitty's bright intelligence, and unwearying attention, that first discovered this alteration in the state of affairs; it was to Kitty that Lady Randall clung as to an elder sister, never satisfied when she was out of her presence, never so happy as when she lay with her own hand locked in Kitty's, looking up, with streaming eyes, into her sweet sympathetic face.

Nor was this sympathy one-sided husband had made upon her life, and who had supplanted her in his love, it tant. was impossible for her, with her sweet womanly feeling, long to remain unmoved by the helplessness of the pretty creature lying there before her in the balance between life and death, or obdurate to the caresses and attention which, as soon as she became conscious Minnie lavished upon her.

In the little bedside conferences which occurred between the two, the key-note was struck which would cause Kitty's nerves to tingle, and so upset her equanimity as almost to render it impossible for her, for the moment, to

"I have been wondering where you came from," said Minnie to her on the second morning of her convalescence : "you seem to have dropped from the skies. It seemed so strange to me, when I came to myself, to find you there -you, whom I had never seen before.

"Oh, do not call me Lady Randall!" said the girl, with a flushing face, "do not address me by that horrible name! But you are not a professional nurse, like Mrs. Gibbs-you are a lady, one can see that in every movement, in every word you utter. Where did you attentive in a sick-room?"

"Such things come by nature, I suppose," said Kitty, with a sad smile; "but I have had a certain amount of experience. I was with Mrs. Travers during a long and serious illness, and it was, doubtless, remembering my management of his wife at that time, that "You should not judge by looks," said Kitty, bending down over the bed to hide the tears which were springing to her eyes. "Whatever may have been the trouble of my life, I have got- a matter of business!" ten over it, thank God!"

"Not so," said Minnie, raising herself in the bed as well as her feeble strength would permit, and throwing her arms round her new-found friend; "these tears prove the contrary. Besides, she added, setting her lips tightly and using a strong effort to bring out the words without hesitation, "though this is an unfortunate episode, you must not look upon the happiness of your married life as ended. Your husband will,

"You do not know him," whispered Minnie, clinging to her; "you do not know what I have suffered up to this sult, all culminating in this coward's blow. Other men might be sorry for what they had done, but he, never! You do not know him!" "No," said Kitty sadly, and with deep sigh, "that is true, I do not know And while the two women were thus taking sweet counsel and making com-

He would be better in the hotel, where all was life and bustle, and where he might come in and go out without being observed. So to the hotel he went. Once settled in his new quarters, he gave himself up to his wild courses with renewed zest. He found he had been mistaken in imagining that his Fatherin-law had been at all compromised by the bank and Railroad speculations into which he had entered, or the financial ruin must have been averted, for the sum which he was accustomed to receive from Mr. Adams' bankers on the first of every month, continued to be regu-

No man in London, having plenty of money to spend, more especially where he has the advantage of a title, need look far for boon companions.

Sir Frederick Randall, impecunious and shifty, dodging the Jews, and sponging upon every one he met, was a very different person from the open-handed baronet with money in his pocket, who entertained splendidly, betted and gambled freely, and always paid when he lost. The former was cut unilearn to be so wonderfully handy and | versally, the letter was declared, by a certain set, to be the best fellow alive. "I understand perfectly! In such a jostling crowd as that, it will not be difficult to manage." When dinner was concluded the two gentlemen strolled into the theatre, which, lighted up and beautifully decorated with floral wreaths, presented a very festive appearance. It was early as yet, and there were but comparatively few persons present, so that the two cured, and watched the proceedings.

Therein they remained for one or two hours-Hoyt sufficiently amused in watching the vagaries of the crowd; Colonel Willamette constantly peering round him with eager, strained gaze, apparently in search of some one who did not arrive.
