OING TO THE BAD BY EDMUND YATES.

CHAPTER VII.—TEMPTED. Sir Frederick was dressed pretty much as he had been on the occasion of his visit to Brauxholme, wearing the same heavy overcoat and overlapping "Hallo," cried Dick Phillimore-"hallo, Fred! What's the meaning of great distance from London, so that I this? Are the Sheriff's officers after you, my boy? If so, this is a very bad place for you to run to earth in; they will find you hear easily, depend upon it."

"Hold your prate!" said Sir Frederick, angrily; "there is no one after me and nothing to fear; the only reason for me rapping myself up in this way was, that it is not exactly the quarter in which a man would care to be recognized as visiting his friends."

"You are right, Fred," said Dick Phillimore, not in the least annoyed, "and it isn't a quarter that I would remain in half an hour longer-but for one reason-that I can't get into any other. It is no good my asking you if you have breakfasted, because if you have not, so much the worse for you. I hadn't enough for myself, and consequently have none to share with my friends."

"Do you mean to say you are as hard up as that?" asked Sir Frederick. "I mean to say," said Mr. Philli-more, slowly fumbling in his pocket and producing two coins therefrom, "that this three-penny bit and this half-penny constitutes my sole means of making a legal tender in the coin of the realm; and I will defy you to pick out from any asylum you choose any one suffi-ciently idiotic to call three-pence halfpenny riches."
"I am not much better off myself," said Sir Frederick, throwing himself into a chair and plunging his hands into his pockets. "It's terribly annoying to be so cramped for money, when there is a prospect of having such a big thing within one's grasp.

"It is always terribly annoying to be pressed for money, dear Frederick," said Mr. Phillimore. "But tell me more about the big thing-how does it progress? What are the chances?" "Partly good, and partly bad," said the baronet, tapping upon the floor with his feet. I have seen the young lady and made her an offer.' "The deuce you have! What a wonderful fellow you are! I never proposed to a woman in my life. And did the young lady accept you?

"She did, then and there, without any hesitation." "That's fine! Now what about papa - - didn't he hesitate at all?" "He knows nothing of it. I told

Minnie not to say a word to a soul about what had transpired between us, until I returned from a little journey I was about to make. Mr. Phillimore emitted a long, low

"You can understand, perhaps, the object of that journey?" asked the baronet, looking hard at him "I conclude," said Mr. Phillimore "It was to see Kitty.

"Rightly guessed," said Sir Fred-"And you have seen her?" "I have."

"Explained what you wished?"
"Sufficiently." "And the result?" "She refuses," said Sir Frederick.

"By the Lord, I knew it?" said Dick Phillimore, bringing his hand heavily down upon the table. "Yes, sir," said Sir Frederick, rising from his chair, and nervously walking up and down the room with short, rapid steps. "I put it to her as strongly as I could, brought all the tact I had to bear upon it, made her see, as I thought, how plain it would be for both our interests -and she refused." "How did she take it?" asked Dick Phillimore, leaning back in his chair, and looking up at his friend : "quietly? "Quietly!" echoed Sir Frederick; "as quietly as a tigress would, if you were to endeavor to steal one of her cubs out of her den. Quietly! She stormed like a tragedy actress; spoke out about my selfishness in leaving her to struggle on on what she called a pittance—she is about right there, she certainly has had little enough money—and accused me of wishing to degrade her by making people believe she was my mistress! She got that notion in her head because I told her I should not care about a woman whom I was pressed to marry, but would come and see her all the same."
