Stanley's Explorations.

[From the Halifax "Chronicle."]

The extravagant praise bestowed on Henry M. Stanley by the journal employing him, together with the evident intention of that journal to make use of the explorer, his dangers and triumphs, as a novel and effective means of advertising, tended largely to discredit the gallant traveller in the minds of the steady-going portion of the community. There was more "brag" about his adventures in search of that prince of African explorers, Dr. Livingstone, than there had been about those of any previous worker in the same field. Even du Chaillu was more modest and made less fuss about finding the gorilla than Stanley—or the New York Herald for Stanley—made about the recontre with Livingstone. Not that the newspaper correspondent did nothing but brag—far from it; he certainly added to the geographical knowledge of the districts traversed, but there appeared a decided wish on the part of his paper to exalt him, not only above all previous African explorers, but also above all future ones, and this the strong common sense of the public would not stand. Burton, Speke, Grant, Baker, and above all Livingstone himself, had, with inadequate resources, done infinitely more than Stanley; the chief difference between them and him being that while they were content to let their work speak for itself, he had a powerful trumpeter in the great New York daily, which blazed his fame abroad and rather impertinently called on all men to fall down and worship in Mr. Stanley the greatest of all explorers. This mistaken policy was largely instrumental in creating a disbelief in Stanley's performances, and for quite a period of time many people refused to credit his account of the meeting with Dr. Livingstone. He had it in him, however, to do real exploring work and to give valuable aid to geographical science, and when the Herald proposed to send him out again—the London Telegraph joining in providing the funds—for the purpose of extending his explorations and clearing up certain points left in doubt respecting the topography of Equatorial Africa, he accepted the task and set about accomplishing it thoroughly.

And now there is no doubt that he is entitled to rank with the leaders of African exploration, having, thanks to a better equipment than any of his predecessors enjoyed, and to his own pluck and energy—qualities which cannot be denied him—traversed the African continent from East to West and definitely settled the identity of the Lualaba of Livingstone and Cameron with the Congo of geographers. Lieutenant Cameron had, in his famous march from ocean to ocean, gained the honor of being the first to span the mysterious continent: he had taken up the Lualaba river at the point where it issues from the mighty Lake Tanganyika and followed its course for a considerable distance, till, indeed, there was no doubt in his mind that he had discovered the head waters of the Congo, but the difficulties he encountered were so great as to bar further progress along the banks of the river, and he accordingly struck off in a South-Westerly direction, reaching the West coast five hundred miles below the mouth of the Congo. Stanley has done what Cameron failed to do—he followed the Lualaba until under the name of Congo it fell into the Atlantic. Nor was his success accomplished with ease, spite of the advantages he had in the shape of a portable steam launch. The hostility of the tribes inhabiting the banks of the great river compelled him to keep in the middle of the stream and fight his way along. For whole days he could not effect a landing, much as he required to do so to procure food for his party, and it was not until he reached the lower districts, where traders had penetrated, that he could have recourse to peaceful, instead of warlike modes of intercourse. His progress was also interrupted by a series of cascades lying near the Equator, past which he had, perforce, to make a portage, no slight matter considering the nature of the country and the bulk of the impedimenta he was burdened with. His achievements are, this time, really marvellous, for in addition to the solution of the Lualaba-Congo problem, he has largely added to the exact knowledge of the great Lakes Victoria, which he circumnavigated, Albert, the Southern end of which he explored, and Tanganyika, the survey of which he repeated. He certainly did not accomplish all this without loss, for out of the 350 men which composed his party when he started from Zanzibar, only 115 reached Emboina, desertion, poisoned arrows and disease having combined to decimate the expedition. But the success which has crowned his efforts, and the valuable contributions he has been enabled to make to geographical science, will amply repay him for the fatigue and danger he has undergone.

Forbes on the Russian Commanders.

"Send away the fools! Give us good generals, and we will fight well enough!" This is a cry which the Grand Duke Nicholas has already heard from his soldiers. Mr. Forbes has named two of the incompetent men. The Grand Duke, he says, is every inch a soldier, and knows how to make himself beloved by officers and men alike. He has great tactical ability, has a coup d'œil for actual battle, would be a good commander on the battle-field, a fighting general, but he is precluded from this role by his position as Commander-in-Chief; and he is not a strategist, or at least has not sufficient confidence in his own ability to take the general direction of the campaign with a firm hand. This he leaves to Nepokoitschitsky and Levitsky. Now, Nepokoitschitsky looks on and watches everything, sees everything, knows everything, and says nothing. He offers no counsel, gives no advice. He keeps silent. The army begins to say that he says nothing because he thinks nothing. Levitsky does everything, and his way of doing things is only too evident. When told before the first battle of Plevna that 20,000 Turks were approaching, he replied, contemptuously, "Where did they spring from?" When informed that they were ready to seize Lovatz, he said, "You had better attend to your own business." Levitsky had preconceived notions as to the numbers and whereabouts of the Turks. He refused to accept information conflicting with those notions. There is nothing to be hoped from such a man. The man to whom all eyes are now turned is Gen. Dragomiroff, who is wounded too severely for command in the field, but not too severely to prevent him taking the direction of the campaign.

Why American Girls Outdress and Outshine their British Sisters.

From London Truth, September 6.

I take it that there are as many pretty girls in England as in the United States. Then why is it that the eye is more attracted in watering places by American than by English girls? The reason is that American girls know how to dress and English girls are devoid of all notion of this most praiseworthy accomplishment. I am not speaking now of irreclaimably dowdy girls, but of girls who really do make an effort to fulfil their duty towards the male sex. These girls seem, however, unable to understand that what suits one person does not necessarily suit everybody. If a tall, thin English girl sees a short, dumpy girl in a dress that sets off her charms to advantage, she appears soon afterwards in an exact copy of this dress, and then indulges in the pleasing delusion that she looks well in it. Thus it is that dumpy girls go about in clothes befitting tall girls, and tall girls in those befitting dumpy girls; that long faces have hats made for fat faces, and fat faces hats made for long faces; that blondes array themselves in colors that look well on brunettes, and brunettes in colors that look well on blondes. Now, American girls rarely fall into these errors. The other day at Homburg I was standing near the spring, talking to an American girl, who looked like a picture, so harmoniously did all the colors in which she was arrayed match and so perfectly did she seem to make one with her clothes, like a bird in its feathers. "How do you manage it?" I asked. "The root of it all is," she answered, "that we each study our own style. We never wear a dress as it comes from a dressmaker, but we drape it ourselves. We know what colors match, and we take care not to produce discords. Nature has not made us all perfect. If we have too long a neck we reduce it by tying a piece of lace around it. If we are short-necked we don't 'dress it high.' If we have long faces we don't wear a tall peaked hat, but if we have round faces we do. Most of us have small feet, but if our feet are large we don't utterly neglect our shoes and our stockings. Then we never forget smaller details. We know where to put a bow, and we don't have too many of them. If our foreheads are high we don't draw our hair back, and if they are low we don't drag our hair over our eyebrows. We don't wear outlandish jewelry because we happen to have it. Indeed, we very seldom wear any jewelry at all, because it looks vulgar. When we are tall we wear a quantity of petticoats; when we are short we wear hardly any. Our petticoats, too, have their fullness in the back, so our figures are always well draped, while the petticoats of English girls have their fullness in the front, and this is why their dresses so seldom hang well. Now, look at that lady," and she pointed to an Englishwoman, to whom nature had not been unkind, but who resembled a handsome giraffe, so tall, so awkward and so gawky did she seem. "She's got no petticoats on to speak of," continued the American. "She makes her face longer than it is by that hat, and she makes her cheeks hollow by wearing long earrings. Her dress is a straight piece of cloth tied back, and she has no overdress. To save the edges, she has looped it up over her petticoat, which is much too short. As the dress is purple she must needs wear red stockings, and as she is flat-footed she makes her feet still worse by her low heels. Her neck is ugly, for it is long and thin and the skin all crinkly, so she shows it at its ugliest by having an open-cut dress. Her arms ain't much, and her wrists bony and quite horrid. As her sleeves are too short, her gloves have only two buttons. Round each of her wrists she has tied a bit of ribbon, with the ends floating, and between the ribbons and her gloves, there is a very disastrous interval of red skin. Then, why has she tied that queer bow at the back of her neck, which makes her look from behind as if her head had been put on the wrong way? Of course as she is tall she has a very small parasol. Now, do just watch her. She knows that she's got good teeth, so she's always on the broad grin. If she would just keep to smiling, her teeth would come in well, but she opens her mouth like a horse and shows her gums in a way that's quite lamentable. She's got good eyes, but this is no reason why she should glare in that bold and audacious manner at any one who comes near her." Then my fair friend pointed to a short, squat English girl. "Observe how that fat girl," she said, "brings her hair down on her forehead, like a Maltese dog. Look at her round hat, which makes her face still rounder. She's covered that green dress all over with bows and beads and ruffles, by which she adds pounds to her natural fat, and it's all lumped up round her neck so as to make her head start out direct from her sholdiers. She's got on a black veil with yellow dots on it, as if she were a brunette, and, as she has only fixed it with one pin, it hangs all awry. Her hair is dressed out behind, much too large for her style. She's got on half a dozen petticoats at least to swell her out. Her belt has quite a number of chatelains attached to it. Her parasol is big and covered with bows, and, to take away even a soupcon of a waist she's got on one of those round, short Norfolk jackets. Well, to be sure, I do declare that the girl has on yellow stockings with brown bars, to help out the thickness of her ankles, though her dress is so long and draggling that, luckily for her, one can hardly see them; and just do look how she has clad her feet. She's got on things she calls shoes, I suppose, but what I call old men's slippers." "But," I mildly observed, "You Americans spend more money on your toilets than English girls. You have a carte blanche at some fashionable dressmaker's and it is no wonder that you cut us out." "That's the mistake that you English make. It is not money that gives us the advantage, but the good taste. There are not five American girls in a thousand who ever have a dress from Paris. What do you think of my hat?" I declared that it was charming, but that any hat, with such a face, would probably be equally effective. "That's nonsense," she said. "I don't say that I'm ugly, but there are hats that would make me look a perfect fright. Well I gave 7 marks (7 shillings) for this hat yesterday, and I trimmed it myself before coming out. An English girl goes into a shop, tries a hat, which takes her fancy, and then puts it on straight over her eyebrows, just as the stupid hat-maker has told her to wear it. Do I look as well like this?" she added, as she pulled her hat forward. I had to confess that it was not an improvement. "The way you wear your hat," she continued warming with the subject, "is just as important as the hat itself. Costly
