CRISSCROSS LOVE.
CHAPTER IV.

At Port Said meanwhile Aggie was sitting on deck with that delightful young man who came on board at Brindisi. He was tall and slight and had a straw colored mustache, Aggie had always had a sneaking fancy for straw color. And beside he was a soldier and aid-de-camp to the lieutenant governor of somewhere up country. (Aggie's Indian geography was as deliciously vague as an Indian secretary's, and "somewhere up country" was about as definite to her as any particular name of any particular district. She regarded all India, indeed, as naturally divided into two main parts—the part where Phil was stationed and the part where he wasn't. Further than that she never tried to go. When people on board talked to her glibly of the Punjab, or the Central Provinces, Saharanpur, or Muzaffargarh, she nodded and smiled benign acquiescence, glossing over her ignorance with the charm of her manner.)
Aggie and the handsome young man got on together admirably. He was a certain Captain Angus Stuart—conjectured from his name to be of Scotch extraction—and he had fallen a victim to Aggie's fluffiness the very first moment he ever set eyes on her. Indeed he had talked to her for half an hour on deck in Brindisi harbor and been desolated to learn by that time that she was not only engaged, but actually going out to India to get married. Nay, he even reflected with a certain bland pleasure at that early stage of their brief acquaintance that there's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip and that people who go out to India to get married don't always persevere in their prime intention when they see their beloved in his Indian avatar. Had it not been for that slight hope Captain Stuart would have avoided talking to Aggie altogether, for being a Scotchman he was of course both prudent and superstitious, and he felt the very instant he began to talk to her that here at last was his undoubted affinity.
If you had ever lain at anchor in Brindisi harbor, or ever made a trip from thence by P. and O. to Port Said, you will be well aware that there's nothing for a sensible man to do with his time as he skirts the shadowy coast of Crete but to make love to some fit and proper person. Now Angus Stuart was a most sensible man, and though he had too great a respect for vested interests exactly to make love to another fellow's affianced bride on her way out to Bombay to join her future husband, yet it must be candidly admitted by an impartial historian that he sailed very close to the wind indeed in that respect and made himself remarkably agreeable to Aggie. She had a chapter, of course. No well educated young woman could trust herself to the Mediterranean and the Indian ocean without the services of a chaplain, but what's the use of that indispensable article in every young lady's wardrobe, I venture to ask, if it persists in being seasick and sticking to its berth the whole way out from London to Aiden? The consequence was that Aggie and Captain Stuart were thrown a great deal together during the course of their voyage. When Aggie sang to the Peninsula and Oriental piano in the big saloon it was Angus Stuart who turned over the leaves of her music book. When Aggie sat on deck and declined lunch with thanks, for pressing reasons, it was Angus Stuart who brought her up the unsugared lemonade and one dry biscuit which alone appealed to her maritime appetite. Old ladies on board remarked with malicious glee what a pity it was poor dear Mrs. Mackinnon wasn't well enough to come up and look after her charge. Old gentlemen observed with a knowing smile that Miss Oswald was going out to be married at Bombay, but they rather imagined she'd mistaken the bridegroom.
Aggie and Angus Stuart, however, went on happily unconscious of the unkind remarks whispered about them in confidence in the saloon at night when they two engaged in admiring on deck the phosphorescence on the waves or the very singular brilliancy of the tropical moonlight.
On one such evening, in the Red Sea, they stood together by the aft rail with one accord and looked over in unison into the deep white water. There was silence for awhile. Then Stuart spoke abruptly.
"You haven't seen him for five years," he said meditatively, without anything special to indicate the personality of the him in question. "That's a very long time, you know, Miss Oswald. At your age and his in five years people often alter wonderfully." (Being himself just 30, and square built at that, Angus Stuart affected always to speak to Aggie in the character of a grandfather.)
"Oh, I hope not," Aggie cried fervently with a little shudder of alarm, for, to say the truth, her new friend had just voiced the very terror that was perpetually consuming her. "It's only five years, you know, and we were awfully fond of each other."
"Were," Angus Stuart answered, with a quiet smile. "You say 'were' yourself. That doesn't quite look as if you were desperately in love with him just at present, does it?" And he smiled at her wisely.

A prudent maiden would have diverted the conversation. But Aggie hesitated and temporized. "Well, five years is a very long time," she admitted, with a slight sigh, "and of course one naturally wonders whether a person will really strike one now exactly as he struck one five whole long years ago."
"Precisely!" Angus answered and dropped the subject. He went on to remark on the beauty of the phosphorescence that sparkled and danced upon the surface of the water. They leaned over to look at it once more together. Lovely object, phosphorescence on the surface of the water, especially when you look over at it, two persons together. In point of fact, they stopped up looking at it, in that balmy southern air, till almost midnight, and only retired to their respective berths just in time for saving the last end of the lights before they were ruthlessly put out for the evening. The old ladies on board shook their heads next day and observed to one another with scandalized faces that the sooner Miss Oswald got safe to Bombay the better for her lover.

CHAPTER V.
At Bombay meanwhile Phil Gilman was sitting out his heart with suspense? Oh, dear, no! He was having an exceedingly pleasant time with Freda Trevelyan. The one drawback to his pleasure—oh, faithfulness of man!—was that thought that his Aggie would soon come out and spoil it all for him.
Freda and he got on admirably together. To say the truth, she was far better fitted for him by nature than Aggie Oswald. He saw it clearly himself now. There was no good denying it. Aggie and he had been thrown together before they knew their own minds, and what was more important still, before their characters had fully developed. They were not fitted by real tastes and instincts for one another. Aggie was a dear little girl, of course, very pretty and dainty and with lovely fluffiness. But was she quite the sort of woman with whom a man of his type would care to pass a whole long lifetime? Wasn't she better adapted, after all, by tastes and habits, for a cavalry officer? Whereas Freda Trevelyan now had a mind and a soul. She was clever, well read, sympathetic, quick, perceptive. Her mind went out to him at once by instinct. She seemed to jump half way to meet every idea he advanced to her. He could almost have fallen in love with that beautiful woman if it were not for Aggie. But Phil Gilman was an honest man, and had plighted his troth to Aggie Oswald. He wouldn't turn aside now—no, not for a hundred Fredas! And yet, isn't it better, he asked himself in his calmer moments, to change your mind before marriage than after it? Isn't it better to cry off, even at some present cost of pain and humiliation to the girl, than to tie her for life to a man who can give only part of his heart to her? Isn't it better to be miserable once for all in one's life than to be miserable always? These questions sometimes intruded painfully upon Phil's mind, but being an honest man, why, he waved them aside as transparent sophisms. Having once asked Aggie to come out and marry him, it would be cruel and wicked and selfish and unworthy to send her home again unmarried. Come what might, as things now stood, he must do his best to avoid falling in love with Freda.
But the human heart is a wayward organ. It refuses to be disciplined by the brain or the conscience. There was some excuse, you know, after all for the apparent fickleness of these two young people. Their minds were in both cases filled full beforehand with the idea of marriage. They had nourished their souls for five long years with what the Scotch philosopher called "love in the abstract" and now, when love in the concrete seemed so near, so very near, neither had at hand the proper person upon whom to expend his or her affection. Besides, it may be unromantic and unconventional to confess the truth, but I believe it is a fact of human nature that when the feelings are very much roused, and the proper persons isn't by to make love to, there's a considerable temptation to transfer the love to the first eligible recipient one happens to fall in with, I've found it so myself, and I throw myself upon the mercy of a jury of matrons. And in both these cases, as it happened, the first eligible person Phil or Aggie met was also one more fitted by nature for the vacant post than the old love could ever possibly have been. Phil felt uncomfortably aware that, though nothing on earth would induce him to make love to Freda Trevelyan, still if he did yield to that dreadful temptation he could have loved her a thousand times better by far than ever he could have loved poor fluffiness Aggie. And Aggie in turn felt that, though it would be treason to think of Angus Stuart when she was actually on her way out to India to marry Phil Gilman, still, if things had gone otherwise, she could have loved that handsome soldier a thousand times better than ever she could love poor philosopher Phil, with his cut and dried collectorship away somewhere up country!

They had both one consolation, perhaps when Aggie turned up after five years' development, she would no longer be the pretty little fluffiness Aggie he once admired, but a real live woman—something, don't you know, like Freda Trevelyan! Or perhaps when Phil turned up he would no longer be quite so sober and grave as of old. Five years of Indian life might have brightened and sharpened him up into something resembling Angus Stuart!
Not a very cheering frame of mind I'm afraid, in which to approach the most solemn of all engagements!
The Indus was telegraphed on the ordinary course from Port Said from Suez, from Aden. The night before she was due to arrive at Bombay, Phil Gilman and Freda Trevelyan sat long talking together. Freda's face was downcast. She was not glad to think that she be the last night, or almost the last night, they would spend together. Of course no well conducted girl would ever dream of falling in love with another woman's affianced bridegroom, but human nature is weak, and though we mayn't quite fall in love under such special circumstances we can't exactly help producing a very good imitation of the genuine article. And Freda Trevelyan certainly liked Phil Gilman exceedingly. He was so bright and so clever and so different from the other men she met at her uncle's. It was a lovely evening. I've observed lovely evenings are peculiarly dangerous. They sat long and talked together on the veranda alone. Sir Edward Moulton, most correct of men chaperons, thought there could be no possible harm in Freda's sitting out with that pleasant young Gilman the very night before the girl he was going to marry arrived from England. So they sat there and talked—and grew more confidential, till at last a faint tremor showed itself in Freda's voice, and even Phil was conscious of a feeling in his throat at a regretful moisture in his eye as he said "good night" to her.
