DISEASED LUNGS

CURED BY TAKING
AYER'S Cherry Pectoral.

"I contracted a severe cold, which settled on my lungs, and I did what is often done in such cases, neglected it. I then consulted a doctor, who found, on examining me, that the upper part of the left lung was badly affected. The medicines he gave me did not seem to do any good, and I determined to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. After taking a few doses my trouble was relieved, and before I had finished the bottle I was cured."

CHATHAM, N. B., DECEMBER 5, 1895.

THE BITER BITTEN.

My uncle, Sir Charles Weatheringay, was an old gentleman who owned a large estate in Berkshire, and was very much respected by the people of his neighborhood. He was kind and indulgent to his tenants, many of whom would sacrifice their lives at any time to be of service to him. The country gentry for miles around were on the most intimate terms with him, and all spoke of him in praise.

There was one man, however, for whom my uncle had a decided antipathy. That was the Reverend B. H. Caldwell, who occupied the glebe lands adjoining my uncle's estate. They had been friends for a number of years but quarrelled at last over some trivial matter, and it made my uncle his enemy for life. Uncle was a good man in most respects, but he had this one failing—if he once took a dislike to a man he never forgot it; and on this occasion his first impulse drove him to seek revenge upon the Reverend Mr. Caldwell.

At this time, in England, sectarianism was very much looked down upon by the Episcopal Church, and as the Reverend Mr. Caldwell was a rigid Episcopalian, my uncle's plan of annoyance was a terrible trial to the venerable gentleman who had been his family minister for twenty years.

The Episcopal church was within fifty yards of my uncle's estate and was the only place of worship the family had ever attended, therefore it was a serious affair to be at enmity with the rector. But uncle was equal to the occasion. He invited several prominent Methodist ministers to come on a visit, and very much to their surprise, offered to give them the ground on which to build a large church.

Of course this piece of magnanimity was eagerly accepted, and drew down upon his head the everlasting thanks of the whole denomination. The work was commenced at once, and was soon completed, under the care of the newly made convert, who took particular pains to have the building erected in full view of the Episcopal rectory.

Little did the Methodists know with what malignant satisfaction the projector of this scheme gloated over the success of his plot, and the terrible anguish of spirit that the Reverend Mr. Caldwell suffered then and during the remainder of his life.

A brilliant young minister was duly installed in the new church, and soon became the spiritual light of the district over which he presided. He was a bright, handsome young man, and had the good fortune to be unmarried. This made him a general favorite at my uncle's house for reasons which will appear presently.

My uncle had a family of sixteen children, three of whom were daughters. The youngest was by far the most beautiful, and was her father's favorite, a fact which he took special care to show; but she inherited a strong will, and notwithstanding my uncle's love for her, he had serious misgivings that she would bring disgrace upon herself and her family.

The young Methodist minister was not slow to perceive the difference between Maud and her sisters; but, although he couldn't help seeing that either Grace or Laura had the advantage of being more refined and better in disposition, yet Maud inspired a love in his breast stronger than he had ever felt for any other woman.

Little by little this acquaintance between the Reverend John Young and Maud ripened and grew into an intense mutual love.

But the course of true love never did run smoothly, and the present case was no exception to the general rule, for Maud was already betrothed to one of the wealthiest young men in Berkshire. This arrangement was made by the parents of both, and in England, among rich families, disobedience to parental authority means something serious, so dear little Maud had trouble in anticipation if she favored Mr. Young's suit.

Young was very diplomatic, however, and he contrived to make love to Maud in a way that completely baffled father and sisters, and he continued to visit the house and retain the friendship of the whole family under a cloak of religion which passed as an excuse for all his actions.

Everything seemed to favour the lovers for a time, but a scene took place one morning before Maud and her father which threatened to mar the pleasure of her future meetings with Mr. Young.

"My dear, it is now time for you to name some definite day for your wedding," her father said, in a very coaxing tone.

Maud was puzzled, but was too wise to say or do anything that would give the old gentleman room for suspicion, so she feigned surprise, and answered:
"Oh, dear papa, do not press the matter so soon; you know I am too young to be married, and it would only be an act of justice to let me wait, at least six months, before placing me at the head of a house, with all the cares and troubles of a wife to bear."

"Humbly! Cares and troubles! A sensible woman should never talk in that way. Your mother was married when she was eighteen, and never regretted it, I flatter myself. Now, Maud, this is all nonsense, for you to desire further delay. Charlie has been quite anxious of late, and he vows that he won't wait any longer."

"Well, dear papa, if you are in such a hurry to get rid of me I must submit; but you must give me a month for you know it will take all of that time to get my wedding dress made."

"Ah, that's better. You are a dear, sensible girl, and you shall have a whole month, whether Charles likes it or not."

And with a parting kiss, father and daughter separated, each apparently satisfied.

As soon as Maud found herself in her own room, and the door carefully locked, she indulged in a fit of crying. She felt as if the time had already come when she must separate from her heart's choice, and marry a man for whom she had no love.

"What is to be done?" she asked herself over and over again, but in her grief she could see nothing but darkness and misery.

At last a faint hope broke in upon the troubled mind—she would see her lover, and tell him all that had passed between herself and her father. Hope seemed to tell her that the object of her choice would be able to suggest a remedy from the impending doom.

The meeting between the lovers that afternoon must have been satisfactory, for Maud returned to her father's house quite flushed, and evidently happy.

She did not appear at the breakfast table next morning, and her maid, being sent to look for her mistress, returned with the awful intelligence that Maud was not to be found. The room was untenanted, and the bed was made up as the maid had left it the evening previous.

My uncle was almost frantic upon hearing this intelligence, and rushed madly upstairs with a vain hope of finding some clue to the mystery. But, alas! it was too true—Maud was gone. Where, how, or when no one in the house could tell, for she was seen going to her room on the evening before, and further than this was not known.

I presume the reader has already guessed the truth concerning Maud's disappearance from her father's home. She had eloped with her lover, and was married when they reached London.

As soon as my uncle discovered the whole facts of the case, his rage knew no bounds. He went about like a madman, threatening vengeance upon the "scoundrel" who had thus thwarted his hopes and disgraced his family name.

He swore that Maud should never inherit a penny of his property or set foot in his house again.

The seeds of revenge which he had sown by building the Methodist church had now grown into a rich harvest for his neighbor, the Reverend R. H. Caldwell. But whatever this pious old gentleman thought on the subject, he had the good taste to keep it to himself, and did not in any way make use of it to return evil for evil.

"The bitter bitten," was all he was heard to remark when he learned the truth of what had befallen my uncle.

Years of sorrow brought the old man to his death-bed, and it was only then that he made amends for the past. Before he died he seemed at peace with the world. Maud and her husband were forgiven, and handsomely provided for in his will, which left them happy and comfortable for a long life of usefulness.

The moral lesson to be derived from this story of my uncle's life is a warning of how easily a man may destroy his own happiness by seeking to injure his neighbor.

Sound Logic.
[Washington Post.]
Last winter a party of tourists visited Mexico, under charge of Charles Gates of Toledo. Having a special train, they could stop as they pleased; and among other things took in a small town near the frontier—name omitted, lest our readers should swarm to see it. While strolling along a little stream, half a dozen male members of the party came across an inclosure with the legend, "Bathing for ladies. Do not look."

had seen that sign they would all have been there.

"Release the prisoners," said the alcalde, while his sides shook with laughter.

"OUGHT TO KNOW—Lady—" "Where is the agent for these flats?" "Man at Door—" "I can rent the flats, mum."

"Are the rents reasonable?" "Yes, mum."

"What sort of a janitor have you?" "A very good one, mum."

"Is he polite and attentive?" "Yes, mum."

"Honest?" "Yes, mum."

"Doesn't he ever steal from the market basket of the tenants?" "Never, mum."

"He's a good Christian man, is he?" "Yes, mum. A politer, more attentive, honest, or more Christian man never lived, mum."

"I am delighted to hear that. Where is he now?" "In him, mum."—[N. Y. Weekly.]

BLUNT TRUTH.—An exchange despairingly asks, "Cannot something be done to prevent our young ladies from being insulted on the streets at night?" Yes, something can be done, and it cannot be done too soon either. Just have the girl's mother tuck her into her little bed about 8 p. m., and lock the door on her.—[Peck's Sun.]
