CRISSCROSS LOVE.

CHAPTER I.

They were simply heartbroken. Yes, I repeat it, heartbroken. No diamond cement that ever was made sufficed to repair the injured organs.

For when Philip Gilman left London to go out to India he cried his eyes red over his sad farewells to Aggie Oswald. They two were in love with one another—madly in love—as boys and girls will be, with that unalterable affection which endures for eternity—or, to be more precisely mathematical, for six months at least on an average computation, Philip had been placed third in the Indian civil competition, and the boundless prospective wealth which that position promises (in depreciated rupees) he proceeded forthwith to lay at the feet of pretty little Aggie. And no wonder he did so, for she was as airy, fairy a little butterfly as ever flitted through a ball-room among admiring lads of one and twenty. Everybody who saw her felt a victim at once to that fluffy brown hair and that arch little smile of hers. No Oxford undergraduate was ever known to resist that tripping tongue; no subaltern at Aldershot was ever known to withstand the winning grace of those pinky white cheeks and those cherry red lips of Aggie Oswald's.

CHAPTER II.

Five years rolled on, and Phil Gilman prospered. He wasn't quite a vicar, to be sure, but he was a deputy collector. Not a man in the Decan got on better than he did. His excellency was pleased more than once in that short time to promote Mr. Philip Gilman to successive posts in successively dreary up country districts. Phil saved and scraped, and all for Aggie. At the end of five years, with his own little income and his rising pay, he began to feel himself in a position to think about marrying. He would send home for Aggie now and ask her to come out to him. He could redeem that long standing pledge and make himself and her happy.

Five years had rolled on, but they had rolled on (as observant souls may often note to be the case) by one day at a time, through 12 months of each year, with long slow regularity. Now, all these months Phil Gilman had written by every mail to Aggie, and by every mail he had heard in return from Aggie again. At first he had sat down to write each time with ardent affection. He had torn open Aggie's letters, when they came, with eager expectancy. But as months passed by and he never saw Aggie this first flush of young love began to die away imperceptibly, until at last, almost without knowing it himself, he sat down so many times a week to write his budget as a pure matter of duty. Sometimes it rather worried him to have to find something fresh to say to Aggie; he wrote not so much because he wanted to write as because he knew Aggie would be disappointed not to get a letter. And so she would have been, indeed; she would have cried very bitterly that Phil should have neglected her. Phil was always so punctual; what could be the meaning of this delay? Was it possible that Phil, her dear Phil, was forgetting her?

There's a vast deal of difference, however, between 21 and 26. For these five long years Phil had saved every penny (he said penny quite naturally now, annas had grown only too common and unclear to him), and at the end of that time, when he began to think to himself he might now send home for his beloved Aggie—why, a strange sort of discovery broke suddenly over him. Great heavens! What was this? Was he overjoyed at the prospect? Did he hail with effusion the advent of that long wished for, that much desired day? Was he half mad with delight, half wild with expectancy? If the truth must be told—oh, dear me, not a bit of it? It occurred to him all at once that for the last two years or thereabout he had been saving and writing not for pure, pure love, but by mere force of habit. The original flame had died down, the original impulse had worn itself out, and now in their place, strange, critical doubts and fears obtruded all unawares their unwelcome faces.

Did he really love Aggie quite as well as he used to do? Did Aggie really love him quite as well as she once said she did? Had they two changed much in those five years of absence? Would Aggie's fluffy hair be quite as entrancing and as errant as ever? Would Aggie's simplicity be as engaging as of old? Or, again, let him see; she was 18 then; would there be any simplicity left at all at 23, he wondered. Looking at the matter philosophically (and Indian civil servants are ex officio philosophers—it's part of the examination), he saw for himself they were mere five years older, and five years might have made a deal of difference to both of them. Each might have developed, and each might now take a fresh view of the situation and of the other. Objectively Aggie might be somebody else; subjectively, he himself might think quite diversely of her. Now, when a man begins to talk of object and subject in these matters at all, you may be perfectly sure the first flush of love's young dream is pretty well over with him. We certainly don't philosophize in the first full rapture. Phil Gilman realized all at once that his love's young dream was all over with himself; he was aware that the idea of Aggie's arrival in India awakened within him, not transient languid curiosity as to what she would look like and how he would feel towards her.

Nevertheless, mind you, Phil Gilman was a man of honor. He stuck to his guns. He hadn't the slightest idea of going back upon his word or even of letting poor Aggie herself doubt the depth of his affection for her. Perhaps this was wrong—who knows? Perhaps the wisest thing, after all for a man to do in such a case is just to make a clean breast of it, rather than involve himself and the girl he once loved in a marriage that may prove unhappy for both of them. But at any rate Phil Gilman didn't think so, and somehow, do you know, I feel as if any man of honor in Phil Gilman's place would have acted just as he did. There's station, and was left behind sobbing. For many nights after she cried herself to sleep. You may laugh at her if you like—you who hold the young palpitating human heart a fit object for your gentle middle aged sarcasm—as for me, I cannot. At 18, which was then exactly Aggie Oswald's age, the loss of a lover, gone to India for six years, is a serious matter. There are those of us in the forties who feel these things still. Let a girl in her teens have our sincerest sympathy.

something so horribly cold blooded in telling a girl who has waited five years for you that you really don't know whether you love her any longer or not that only a very brutal man, I fancy could ever consent to do it. It may be wise to act like that, no doubt, but there are qualities, after all, more to be prized than wisdom. I wouldn't give twopenny myself, dear friends, for a young man so wise as that comes to.
