CHATHAM, N. B., MAY 30, 1895.

LOVE IN MASQUERADE.
I dreamed that love came knocking At your door one midnight night, While the specters there were rocking In a blast of savage blight. "Oh! I love you, love you, love you," "Ope the door, for love's dear sake." But, although you heard and heeded, Still no answer came to his knock. Not one word of sweet replying Would your laughing lips have said, Even if love had lain there dead!

AN ASSURANCE POLICY.
One evening as Bracken, the detective, and I were strolling leisurely through Fitzroy square, he pointed across the way and said: "Did you ever hear of Ferdinand Prevot, a Frenchman and an artist?" "I cannot say I have." "He lived in that house opposite. He had come over here from Paris to seek his fortune as a painter. Then he was a handsome young man of five-and-twenty, with very taking manners and many accomplishments. He had no success as an artist, but he found the fortune he wanted in the possession of a widow, and he married her, a woman much older than himself, and very rich. "No sooner was the knot tied than he began to make her money fly. In five years they had a rap. He was always a gentleman to his elderly wife. He never failed in politeness and attention to her, and she simply worshipped him; and, as far as we ever heard, though she saw her money slashed about right and left, they had no serious quarrel about it. He had the good sense and good taste to include his wife in all the extravagant schemes by which he dissipated her fortune. "About a year ago it was gone, except an insurance of a thousand pounds on his wife's life. They still lived over the road, but open house had been abandoned, horses and carriages put down, and the half dozen servants reduced to none at all. The door remained unopened to callers, though now and then Prevot entertained a few intimate friends in his studio, where he gave them beer and birdseye instead of the champagne and Havanas of other days. "Very little was now seen of Mrs. Prevot. When her husband was asked about her, he shook his head and sighed, and said her health and spirits were so bad she could not find heart to meet anybody, or go out of the house even for the air, and he was much afraid she would fall into deplorably bad health indeed. "Then he told his friends he had insisted on Mrs. Prevot seeing a first-rate doctor, and that she had been ordered abroad, was now in Paris with friends of his own, and that he had begun to hope she was on the way to recovery. It was, he said, his intention to take up his residence in Paris as soon as he could settle their affairs in London. "A week later he declared the improvement in his wife's health had not been maintained, and that she was worse than before leaving England. During a couple of weeks more he reported her going from bad to worse, and at the end of another week informed his friends that his poor wife's case had been, by the Paris doctors, pronounced hopeless, and that she was going away to fetch her home. "He went on Monday, the 16th of October, coming back on Friday, the 20th, and driving up to his own door in a four-wheeler. Mrs. Prevot was a small, fragile woman at the best, and the hearts of the neighbors were saddened and softened to see the loving care and solicitude with which this splendidly furnished carriage carried his sick wife into their old home to die. Many a rickety man like him would have let her die in Paris among strangers instead of bringing her back to her own country. It could not be said he brought her back to her own people, for she was childless and had no relations of her own, and all her husband's cut her on her marriage with this penniless foreign adventurer. "Mrs. Prevot's condition was so bad that no one was allowed to see her, and in little over a week all the blinds of the house were down. One or two of Prevot's closest friends were then allowed to see all that was mortal of the artist's wife, and declared they found her very little changed—something thinner and a good deal paler, that was all. This was the first day. The second day all who called were admitted to the death chamber. By the time the body had been placed in the coffin with a glass panel so that all might see the face, Prevot explained that the nature of the case made such an arrangement desirable. The funeral took place on the fifth day. Nothing noteworthy occurred at it. Every one who saw the new made widow noticed how becomingly she bore herself; her conduct was just the perfection of suitable behavior, making no parade of his grief nor any attempt to conceal natural sorrow. "A week after the funeral the insurance was paid, and the money was handed to the company's commissionaire with me. The friends who were so kind to see her, they feared, about the death and burial of the late Mrs. Prevot, whose life was insured for a thousand pounds, and whose husband had sent in a claim for the money. "Irregularly of what kind? I asked. "Well," said the secretary, "to be plain with you, we suspect foul play. To begin with, no friend of the dead woman saw her in London during her last illness. He was alone, without servant or nurse in the house, with the deceased, and we have just discovered that the doctor's certificate is forged." "That looks black enough," said I, "and what is the name of the man?" "We do not know. We suppose he has left the country. He has placed his claim in the hands of a solicitor." "Have you refused to pay the claim?" I asked. "Oh, no. But we will not pay it until you have cleared up the case. You may go ahead at once and do all things necessary." "Very good," said I, "this is clearly a case for examination and an inquest. The formalities for taking up the body will be full compliance with me." "Which proves, Bracken," said I, interrupting the detective, "that of the London insurance companies one has a most acute and discriminating secretary." Bracken did not resent this speech. Over his face a quiet smile stole. "I lay you first one you do not solve the riddle now." "A bet on such a glibly subject," said I, severely, "would be out of place—horrible. Go on, Bracken, go on."

Neuralgia

ATTACKS THE EYES
Makes THE LIGHT Unbearable.
PERMANENTLY CURED BY USING

Ayer's Pills
"My husband was subject to severe attacks of neuralgia which caused him great pain and suffering. The pains were principally about his eyes, and he often had to remain in a darkened room, not being able to stand the light. Ayer's Pills being recommended, he tried them, and using one before each meal. They very soon afforded relief, followed by permanent cure. I am a strong believer in the efficacy of Ayer's Pills, and would not be without them for ten times their cost."—Mrs. M. E. DEWAY, Liberty, Tex.
