PROF. BLACKIE. Sketch of an Extremely Interesting and Attractive Personality.

Professor John Stuart Blackie, who died in Edinburgh in his 86th year on the 2d March, 1895, was, in many respects, one of the most remarkable and attractive characters of his time. A Greek scholar of rare accomplishments, an admirable writer and a keen, original thinker, it was chiefly his strong and unconventional eration. As is the case with Mr. Gladtemperament an exquisite blending of both conservative and radical convictions. without a trace of the pessimism that not infrequently accompanies old age. Buoyant and vivacious in spirit, he preserved long after he had passed the alloted share of human existence that fresh and untrammelled outlook upon life which rendered him so interesting and so attractive

Rome, and at 25 he was called to the bar, His legal career, however, was brief. He decided to devote himself to scholastic duties, and in 1842 he was appointed to the newly formed chair of Latin literature at Marischal College, Aberdeen. In 1851 he became Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh, a post which he held until his retirement from professional give little indication of his unusual and valuable record of achievement. He was not only a university professor; he was one of the great teachers of men. A very celebrated man, who had been a student in Edinburgh, said that he had learned more wisdom from Professor Blackie than from an entire faculty and any number of books.

any day in Edinburgh, striding along from Douglas-crescent to Prince street, or back again, hale as an athlete, hearty as a young hunter, his cloud of white hair tossing about his head and flapping up against his big brimmed soft black hat; his cheeks rosy with the air, and his kind eyes dancing with the delight he took in his favorite walking exercise, A recent interviewer gave the world an interesting description of the Professor at home. He was described as a "tall, old man, with a great, strong, clear-cut, smooth shaven face, like one of the traditional gods of his favorite lore, yet in no other respect resembling the mythological at that instant. His head was crowned with one of the last efforts of modernity, a huge straw hat, and his body was lost dressing gown, which came to his heels, rards of red silk sash, the ends of which sprawled to the floor. He is not what the anecdote mongers call a 'conversationalist.' He does not converse; he explodes, His talk is volcanic. There comes an eruption of short sentences, blazing with the philosophy of life. There is a kindly glow in it all, and the eruption subsides quickly, with a gentle troll of song." ian; he was in love with Greek for more than sixty years; "Greek," he used to say, among them are his "Self Culture,"

JULES VERNE OF TO-DAY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE WORLD

IN EIGHTY DAYS" AS HE IS-The Great Author's Personal Appearance. His Modesty Regarding His Work-His Method of Working as Detailed by Him-

The author of "Round the World in Eighty Days," "Five Weeks in a Balloon," and many other delightful stories which cannot but have endeared his personality to hundreds of thousands of readers in every part of the world, spends his happy, well-filled working life in Amiens, a quiet, French provincial town situated on the direct route from Calais and Boustone, there was in the late Professor's logne to Paris. Jules Verne, in his personal appearance, does not fulfill the popular idea of a great author. Rather does he give one the impression of being a cultured country gentleman, and this despite the fact that he always dresses in the sombre black affected by most Frenchmen belonging to the professional classes. His coat is decorated with the tiny red button denoting that the wearer possesses the high distinction of being an officer of the Legion of Honor. As he sat talking he did not look his seventy-eight years, and indeed, appeared but little changed since the portrait, hanging opposite that of his wife, was painted some twenty odd years

> M. Verne is singularly modest about his work, and showed no desire to talk about either his books or himself. Had it not been for the kindly assistance of his wife, whose pride in her husband's genius is delightful to witness, I should have found it difficult to presuade him to give me any particulars about his literary career or his methods of work. "I cannot remember the time," he served, in answer to a question, "when I

You know, I am a Breton by birth-my native town being Nantes-but my father was a Parisian by education and taste, devoted to literature, and, although he was too modest to make any effort to popularize his work, a line poet. Perhaps this is why I myself began my literary career by writing poetry, which-for I followed the example of most budding French literateur—took the form of a five-act tragedy," he concluded with a half sigh—half smile, "My first real piece of work, however," he added after a pause, "was a little comedy written in collaboration with Dumas fils, who was, and has remained
