it shows that, having spoken a few minutes upon this question, I have said nothing so offensive as to prevent the house from enjoying a very hearty laugh at a little Irish slip of mine. I say that in dealing with this question we should approach it in broad spirit, in order to establish the co fidence of every citizen in the country the constitution is strong enough to protect him in all the rights he enjoys under it and that this parliament, and the representative men in this country of both political sides. can have no two opinions, upon that subject. The constitution must be observed, all rights beverages, and that the revenue require under it must be preserved, so that every ments of the country should not be citizen in the country may feel that in our considered a reason for the continuance constitution he has a safeguard that no
