CHAPTER XV-FACE TO FACE.

Jera Le Britta reached the bustling little town where the lawyer of the Vernon estates resided late that same evening, but went to the village hotel and deferred calling upon him till the following day.

Exhausted nature played the photographer a sad trick, however. He slept beyond the anticipated hour, and with no little trepidation observed that it was after ten o'clock the following morning Refreshed, however, by his long recuperating sleep, and fortified by a hearty breakfast, Le Britta started forth, his head clear, his energies revivified, his courage dauntless, to enter the lists against the ex-tramp and schemer. who sat like some bird of ill omen brooding exists?" over the fortunes of Hawthorne villa." Disappointment baffled his efforts to find the lawyer. The latter was at court at an adjoining village. Le Britta AND IRON, decided to go there after him. Then, on second reflection, he determined to await his return, and then, a sudden idea coming to his mind, he started with resolute face and a confident heart in the direction of Hawthorne villa

> "Yes. I'll risk it!" he soliloquized. "It can do no possible harm. It may be my final interview with Ralph Durand, the faded writing? Had he blundered and as I am in no wise afraid of him. I will give him a bit of wholesome advice. if nothing more. I hold a weapon in my hand which may frighten, unman him, drive him away. The effect of the photograph upon him will be a guide as to our future movements." Cogitating over this course, Le Britta reached the villa. He paused at its gate to regard several persons in the One was the redoubtable Ralph Durand himself. He was arrayed in flashy garments, and his flushed, brutal face, early as was the hour, showed unmistakable evidences of intoxication He was ordering two servants to do some work about the garden.

"Rip up those beastly roses!" he com manded, "and pull away those hideous vines from the veranda. We want no sentimental gew-gaws of shrubbery about here Le Britta's eyes flashed with indignation, he realized the power of this a word, when his heart was in its uncultured boor to destroy Gladys' beloved flowers. Calming himself, however, for the impending interview he was determined to precipitate, he opened the gate and walked up the graveled path. "Hello!" ejaculated Durand, staring insolently at his visitor; "you here!" "As you see," responded Le Britta, quietly. Durand's brow grew dark and forbidding as a thunder-cloud. "I thought I ordered you to remain off these premises," he continued, in an insulting, aggressive tone of voice. "You did."

"You'd better obey me!" "I have business here, sir." "You have what?" "Susiness- urgent, important, personal. "Out with it then!" "Not here. I wish to see you alone." "Ch! that's it?" muttered Durand. 'I don't see what 'business' you can have with me? I'm king here now. The law can deal with that meddler Vance, and as to Gladys, if you've come to intercede for her, it's no use. I'm her legally-appointed guardian. Let her come back and behave herself, and its all right." "I have come on behalf of neither of the persons you name," spoke Le Britta. "As to Gladys, she will never, I am assured, return while you are here. As to Sydney Vance-no one seems to know "Don't, eh?" sneered Durand, coarsely.

"No, unless it is yourself." The shot told. Durand changed color. He clenched his hands angrily, then, repressing the natural antagonistic instincts of his quarrelsome nature, he said, insolently:--

"Well, come in, and get through with this 'business' of yours as quickly as you can. Your room is better than your company in my house, I can tell you

Jera Le Britta subdued the rising anger and indignation he felt with a master mind. He realized the uselessness of heeding or retaliating for the insults heaped upon him by his half-intoxicated host. He had come to fulfil a mission. and he comprehended that Durand's condition was favorable to the hoped-for outcome of the interview he projected. Durand led the way to the room where Le Britta had first seen dead Gideon Vernon. He threw himself into an arm-chair, and frowned at his visitor. "Go ahead!" he ordered. "I have come to see you," announced

"To warn you," repeated Le Britta, "Of what?" "Of your peril, of the future. Ralph Durand, I shall waste no words upon you. I know that you substituted an evaporating acid for ink, and reduced Gideon Vernon's last lawful will and

"Good!" he jeered, disdainfully. "Go "You murdered Gideon Vernon"-Durand started violently. "You know what has become of Sidney Vance. You are protting to wreck this estate for your own personal benefit during the term of your guardianship.'

"Anything else?" queried Durand, "Is that not enough? Are you human, to sit there, heartless, sneering, merciless while the rightful owner of this home is a wanderer and an outcast!' cried Le Britta indignantly. "Do you want my answer in plain words?" ground out Durand.
