Cora looked at the big, robust woman, so appropriately called Strong, and felt that she was indeed a prisoner. Strong bowed in silent submission to the will of her late mistress, and turned her broad visage upon her new one. Madeline moved to leave the room, with a return to her former manner: "Goodnight, step-mamma; try and go down to breakfast with me in the morning, won't Without waiting for a reply, she opened the door and swept across the hall, and Cora heard her close the door behind her Not deigning a single glance at Strong, Cora sat tapping her foot upon the carpet and reviewing the situation After some angry musing, the practical side of her nature began to assert itself She reflected that she was not, after all, in immediate danger; and that she would be still, to all outward appearance, the mistress of Oakley There was not much to fear just now, and she would keep her eyes open Meantime, she would not be unnecessarily uncomfortable And so, being by nature indolent, she decided to make the most of the unwelcome Strong Turning toward the statue-like figure, she galvanized it into life by saying:-

"Strong, get my dressing-gown from that closet, and then take off my dress" And Strong commenced her duties with cheerful alacrity.

> CHAPTER XXXIX. MYSTIFIED PEOPLE.

John Arthur sat before a smoldering fire, gazing moodily down at the charred embers that had lost their glow and only showed a dark red light here and there, as if to assure one that there was fire in

He was thinner than of old His face wore a sickly pallor. His hands that clutched the arms of his invalid's chair worked incessantly, indicating surely that his nerves were in anything but a state of calm He was feeble, too, in body; but Roger Flanagan's his mind, spite of verdiot of the Bellair physician and the drugs of the Professor, was still unimpaired

In the solitude of the two rooms, out of which he had not once stepped since first he was removed to the west wing, he had had ample time for reflection; but a sneer on his lip, and in a tone which he had by no means arrived at a state of proved clearly that time and imprisonmental beatitude He had found it useless to struggle, useless to bluster, to argue or to plead Henry was a merciless jailer, and Dr Le | you come back here like a young prin-

Guise a sarcastic one

His breakfast had been served, and stood upon the table beside him; but he scarcely glanced at it When Henry came in from the ante-room to remove the things, he said, without looking up: "Go ask Le Guise to come to me' Henry carried away the tray, deposited it in the ante-room, locked the door of the chamber carefully, and made his way to the breakfast room At that moment, the incongruous mixture called the family, were there assembled, including the Professor The latter was just then discussing the condition of his patient with Miss Payne, in blissful ingorance of the fact that the young lady was fully conversant with his mode of treatment, and the true condition of her step-father's health "You see, my dear young lady," the Professor said, pompously, "his is the worst form of insanity; the very worst

When a patient raves constantly we know precisely what to do with him But when he is, at times, to all appearance, as same as yourself, and yet liable at any moment to blaze out a perfect madman, one dislikes to treat him as a madman, and yet it is not safe to conside: him a sane being" Madeline nodded, with a splen lid assumption of profound interest "It's a sad case," she said, pensively "I almost dread the interview" "I think he is quite collected this morning, and he may be calm throughout I hope so, for I should not like to have you witness one of his tantrums" "I have seen him in tantrums when he was considered sane," said the girl, with an odd intonation.

Then looking up, she saw Henry, who had entered the room and stood staring at her in speechless amazement. Hagar had informed him that his young mistress was in the house. But he was not prepared for the vision of loveliness that the girl presented, as she turned toward him clad in her morning robe of snowy cashmere bordered with swansdown, and trailing after her like a train of snow. Luckily no one noted his start of surprise and quick glance of recognition, and Madeline said:—

"Is not that my step-father's attendant, doctor? I think he wants you." The "doctor" beckoned Henry to approach, and said, affably: "Well, and how is our patient, Henry?" "About as usual, sir. But he wants to

"Oh, he does? Poor soul, I'll come directly, Henry." Then, turning to Mad-"Shall I break to him the news of your arrival?" "No; not unless you think it unsafe to surprise him. "On the contrary, an agreeable sur-prise might prove beneficial,"

The Professor, who had received sundry instructions from Davlin, assumed to be ignorant of the fact that the patient supposed his step-daughter dead Smiling a little at the hypocrisy of the man, who pretended to have at heart the interest of a patient supposed to be in an excessively nervous state, yet was quite ready to expose that patient to the shock of meeting, without previous preparation, one supposed to be dead and in her grave, Madeline turned, and with a gesture brought Cora to her side "Is Dr Le Guise aware that my steppapa believes me to be dead?" she asked
