It fitted his athletic form till the wellbuilt muscles showed swelling and rounded with health and vitality.

The light cap surmounted a brow broad, intellectual, yet bronzed with exposure to the summer sun. Beneath it flashed eyes poetic, earnest, yet active, subdued to tenderness as they took in the dreamy glories of nature, yet susceptible of expressing vivid emotion when the heart was deeply stirred. The chin was narrow, yet set, the mouth, sympathetic, yet firm, and, altogether, the striking combination of gravity and gentleness, resolution and tenderness, calculation and purity, method and dreaminess, evinced that tramp.

their possessor was a remarkable man. His light tennis-shoes showed preparation for tedious tramps, and were travelworn and dusty. Across his shoulder ran a strap secured to an oblong case. Hanging to it, too, was what resembled a small portable photographic camera. He had paused as he stepped from shelter to enjoy momentarily the glories | the slimy serpent bent on decoying and of hill, field and valley spread before him like a painter's canvas, and to drink in the deep, exhilarating draught of the his keenest sense of chivalry, too, and he fresh, cool air, when, with a start, he his fine face, he uttered the quick, in- incipiency all the elements of a strange voluntary wordof a true artist in his survey of the smiling landscape, it now glowed with the eager appreciation of a true musician. For the divine trinity of pure pleasure was completed, golden light, glowing nature, and now seraphic melody.

Birds were singing, but it was not their sweet notes, clear and resonant as silver beads dropped into a crystal dish, that entranced him. A near waterfall trickled over the rocks with a swinging murmur of har- halt. mony, the soft zephyrs swayed the pines to the rhythm of Acolian melody, but these sounds were drowned in a full, glorious burst of magnificent song.

Like one held in the thrall of the most exquisite pleasure, the young man listened enrapt. 'Help some soul its strength renew, As the journey we pursue, Oh! the good we all may do,

While the days are going by!" The words rang out clear and echoing, every quivering leaf seemed to vibrate with them-the golden, lute-like voice that pronounced them seemed to be too seraphic to be human. Well might he listen! Well might the scintillating raindrops throb and jar in consonance with the noble song that filled air, heart and senses as if thrilled from the lips of a famous diva! "Is the wood enchanted?" The stranger asked himself the question in a subdued tone, as if fearful of breaking a spell of magic. Then, with wistful eyes and eager steps, he stole along the path leading to 000. a copse, from whence or beyond which had certainly emanated that full, clear ourst of glorious melody. He penetrated the little belt of timber.

The forest nymph was nowhere in sight. Approaching its other edge, however, he drew back suddenly, warily The fair one stood revealed. If the song had enchanted the traveler, the singer held heart, interest and glance under a new spell of witchery.

Where some wild vines formed a kind of canopy, she lingered, as if there she had taken temporary refuge from the passing shower. Dreamy influences about her, pure emotions awakened by the happy voices of nature, her soul had found expression for its thoughts, ambitions and aspirations in that song of praise and hope. Her face was perfect, her form rounded to the symmetry of a Niobe. Only the eyes, half veiled with dewy sadness, told that she was other than some happy maiden, content to wander forever amid the budding beauties of field and forest. "What a picture!" The stranger breathed the words soft and low. If his eyes expressed admira-tion of the lovely face, that ardor was tempered with the quick, artistic sense that proclaimed him to be a true poet and dreamer, "I must catch that face-the scene, its surroundings," he went on, eagerly. "Nature, beauty, art-if she will only keep that pose for another moment!" His eyes fixed intently upon her, the stranger deftly slipped the small box from the strap across his shoulder. He removed its canvas covering, revealing as he did so a neat photographic eamera, provided with catch, slides, focus adjustments and automatic shutter for ready manipulation. Leaning it against a gnarled, stout vine, he got a perfect focus on the bower, the girl and her immediate sur-The back of the case came into view as he did so. Across the black surface, in plain white letters, was painted a name -his name-for identification of the camera, to protect it from loss or theft.

It read :-
