he discovered they were left. Lord Rackett ventures the august opinion that this is the work of train robbers, who intended going through the sleeper when the remainder of the eastbound train had passed from sight. Some of the passengers grasp this story eagerly. Strange how people want to be connected with some notoriety, especially when it does not cost anything and involves no dangers.

said lands to the place of beginning being the property presently known as the 'Datey House and Doperty," and was conveyed to the said Martina Doctor Jack and Larry exchange a glance, and even the dude's smile is suggestive. Evidently they know just about how that car chanced to be left behind. The rough man was all in the mind of the indignant Garcia. Again they move forward.

One of the colonel's first acts is to wash his hands, which fact Larry reports with considerable emphasis.

The conductor is suspicious, and during the remainder of the night keeps a close watch upon the sleeper "Diana." It will not redound to his credit to leave a car filled with first-class passengers standing on the main track. It is a game of diamond cut diamond, now, and as yet Jack seems to be holding his own, yes, and gaining ground continually. Another dawn and all well. So the day and night pass and Ogden is left far behind.

The train is on time. That golden ubricator appears to be doing its duty remarkably well. There is nothing like t to surmount difficulties when it comes to railroad travel. "When do we reach Denver?" asks

Larry, who begins to weary of this chase against time. "In a few hours," returns the doctor, handing over the time-table, for they have left Chevenne. They are whirled on their way. The great Rockies have been climbed, beyond which lie the prairie lands of the corn-growing states. Their enemies seem very quiet, but it s at such times the most danger is to be looked for. Perhaps they have engaged in a little surprise of their own, which may be sprung upon the party of Doctor Jack at the moment when least expected. Denver opens before them

"Get in readiness, Avis, but show no more excitement than if we meant to stop here for a meal like the rest of the passengers," and Jack snaps his valise shut, "How about our trunks?" she asks,

"Denver-half an hour for dinner," cries the brakesman, passing through the The train rolls into the depot, and stops. Around them is the wizard city of Colorado, where in a decade magnificent blocks of business houses and lovely palaces have sprung into existence.

They do not mean to lose any time, but having gathered what few packages they carry, are ready to leave the sleeper as soon as it comes to a stop. Larry leers at milord, who, standing in the aisle, looks after them with a peculiar expression on his face, and then this pretty scheme originated in his brain makes a motion with his arm to Colonel

No doubt he is very much surprised at seeing them with their luggage—at least Larry takes this view of it-for a very brief space of time. They pass out.

The conductor awaits their coming, for he desires to see them win, and at once

"Follow me, Doctor Jack. I will show you where your special lies.' "They got wind of our plans-knew we had a special here-teared lest their own plans might miscarry, and came here to take adayntage of our forethought. Perhaps they sighted us coming through the depot, and leat such a hasty retreat that our colonel torgot his head-gear." Again Larry wags his head as though ne agrees with his companion. "The question that arises now is of great importance to us. Did those men in their hasty retreat give up their captured position here, or are they still secreted about the car?"

It is, indeed, a serious thing to decide. "A queer twick to play on us. Wonder how they bwibed the conductor and porter?" ventures Larry, half to himself. Doctor Jack sneers as he puts his hand in his pocket, takes out a handful of coins and jingles them together. "That music will accomplish wonderful things, my boy, astonishes things.
