and the captain glows with pleasure to and his labour appreciated by his chief. Having made further arrangements with regard to having a boat meet hem at Seraglio Point just after dusk, to take the ladies aboard, he goes ashore. Achmed is his next victim, and a short consultation between the two results in a further advance of the plot. The time wears on apace, and it will not be long ere they may know just low successful the plan is to be, and whether Aleck Morton will escape, or leave his bones to whiten on Turkish

Having nothing more to do at present Jack heads toward the house-he has eaten a meal in the middle of the afterroon, and it now lacks but an hour or so of evening. Avis is watching for him. There need be no more secrecy between them now, for they have confessed all their little shortcomings to each other, and are cren lovers. Jack's mind is full of business, however, and he cannot dally long, no matter now pleasant it may be in the company of this fair girl from over the sea. He asks Avis "Do you suppose you and Aunt Sophie could get what articles of clothing you may need until we reach Rome, in my portmanteau ?" What a terrible question to ask a young girl desirous of appearing well in the eyes of her lover, but Avis looks him straight in the eyes, and says "Yes, if you will promise not to tire of seeing me in the same dress day after day."

"You look charming in anything. We have no time to lose, dear Avis. Go to your room, and explain to aunty. In five minutes I will have the portmenteau at your door. In fifteen you must have your trunk packed so that I can take it to the railway station, and ship it to Rome, which, I guess, is a possible thing." "Oh! Jack, what if it should be

"Save your little keep-sakes. As for dresses and millinery, we can replace them at Rome-they may be your wedding trousseau. Now, make all the haste possible, dear girl. Every minute counts." He goes to his own room, and collars Larry, who is set to work on his own small trunk. For a time great energy is displayed. At the end of the fifteen minutes the two trunks are carried off to the railway station by Jack, who has, through Achmed, engaged a vehicle by the hour. He finds they can be sent to Rome, and that is one load off his mind. As he returns in the vehicle to the house it begins to grow dusk. The time is near when they must depart, Jack has been wise enough to have Achmed as a driver. Another man might have learned too much and betrayed them finally to the Pasha for a consideration. Reaching the house, Jack joins in the meal then being served. The ladies have their hats on, and are all ready for travelling. Avis looks anxious but brave, and did Jack call upon her to aid him in his desperate plans she is in a spirit to meet him At last they enter the old vehicle-the best Achmed could pick up in Stamboul, where porters carry loads instead of beasts of burden, and donkeys take the place of horses very generally, although many Turkish offirers own Arabian steeds. The ride is a quiet one-indeed, conversation could not be carried on in the lumbering old vehicle, that pitches and tosses terribly. Avis is content to sit beside Jack. In the darkness he has an arm around her, and holds her hand in his. He does not know whether heaven will be kind enough to let him look on this kve of his again, and the thoughts that flock in his mind are solemn ones. At length the horrible lurching, so like a ship riding out a heavy sea at anchor, ceases, and Achmed comes to let them out. They have arrived, the lights on the water show where various ships are lying at anchor, and Jack eagerly points out one particularly bright gleam, saying :-"That is our yacht, Avis. We shall take our wedding trip in her." at which she laughs a little, though too serious just now to think of much levity. The boat is quickly found, the portmanteau and ladies put aboard, a few words exchanged, a low order of "let fall, lads," given, and they separate. Jack draws a long breath of relief-at least Avis is safe from the clutches of the Pasha. He has had a strong idea all along that it is Abdallah's intention to put another nail in Aleck's coffin by scheming to get possession of his sister by fair means or foul, and this accounts for Jack's manifest delight at having cheated the Turkish ogre of his prey-yes, thank God, Avis is safe, no matter what happens to

Johnston, against the So, with something of a light heart he takes Larry with him, and heads in the direction of the pasha's great wall. Achmed is given time to temporarily dispose of the vehicle. Some one is found who will see that the antiquated affair-half way between a Russian drocky and a Parisian cabrioet-is taken back to the owner, who has already been paid for its use. When the old Turk rejoins them it an act to incorporate a company to be called 'The arry has just remembered something

"I left word for another telegram from up the road, regarding the train, and meant to call for it this evening. out, bless my soul, I forgot all about it," he laments, dismally, as though conscious of having lost prestige. "Never mind-we'll guess at it. Say the old slow poke express will be four hours late-that means two a.m. What do you call it ?"

"I'd make it daybreak, judging from the experience we've had," re-Both wrong, gentlemen. Since last heard from that delayed train has broken the record. The pasha has bought the officers in charge body and soul, and the rails have become actually hot under the flight of the express eastward. From this time on it will be known as the Flying Turk. The whistle that our friends hear in the distance as they halt under the wall actually announces the arrival of the express within three miles of Stamboul. It will draw up to the station exactly on time. This gives a chance of complicating matters. There is a prospect of a lively time ahead. Jack and the two with him mount the wall in the same way as on the preceding night, the rope serving the a good turn. Instead of going directly toward the palace, they turn in the quarter where Jack and Aleck wrestled with the Turk's janizaries on the occasion of their former visit, when Aleck was captured. In a short time they reach the shore, where the little waves are chasing each other over the pebbly beach with a gentle lapping sound. Jack books out over the darkened water, but can see no yacht. If she is anchored at the buoy still she has doused her riding lights, so that her position may not be known. Is the boat's crew ashore? He walks along a short distance, until a boat turned bottom up is sighted. This is the place agreed on as a rendezvous between them. Jack gives a signal, and a dark figure rises up from behind the overturned boat like low tones. "Yes, sir," comes the guarded re-

A few sentences pass between them. and Jack understands that all is in readiness, waiting for the signal. The men are dressed like Turks, so that should they be seen it will be believed they come from Stamboul, and are thither bound again. Satisfied with this, Jack again seeks his two companions, and they turn toward the palace. Somehow he seems to feel a heavy weight upon his spirits "Larry, are you armed?" he asks.

"Yes, but you don't think we're going to have a wumpus, do you? To my mind the coast seems clear as midday," returns the dude, wondering what has come over the usual philosophical Jack, and laying his nervousness at love's door. "I don't know. I seem to feel it this without some excitement, and I believe in being ready. Yonder loom up the palace walls. Forward all, to rescue Aleck-then we're off on the blue sea."

Not so fast, Doctor Jack-some things are easier said than done, you

CHAPTER XXIII. The bells have rung out the hour before Jack and his friends leave the beach, so it is a litte after ten when they come in sight of the palace walls. At this very moment a vehicle is being driven from the railroad depot to the Unieed States. A "committee of a fee of a dozen gold medjidies can urge the driver to hasten. In this carriage three men are seated-we Pasha, Don Carlos, and the matador, atory, edro Vasquez. The last has come a ong way for revenge, but he has enered the service of the Turk, and bidlen farewell forever to Madrid, whose ickle populace would rever greet him save with jeers after that last unfortunate engagement with the black toro that Senor Jack slew, Unless our friends are exceedingly active in their work, they will hear something drop. The furious Turk is COME EARLY AND BRING YOUR ORDERS! rushing home as if some intuition has warned him of danger. When he arrives at his own a whirlwind will

Doctor Jack is the first to reach the palace wall. He has noticed particularly where the spot is, and marked it, so that a minute later he bends down to feel for the grating. There it is, sure enough, just as he believed. How quickly the athletic American secures a strong clutch of the barshe braces himself for a grand effort -no man in Abdallah Pasha's employ could accomplish such a feat, but Jack's greatest power lies in his hips and back.

As Achmed and Larry come up, the former with a small iron bar he has brought for the purpose, they hear a crackling sound "What's that ?" demands the dude

"I have torn the grating from its socket," replies Jack, breathing hard, send o and yet speaking as though it were nothing of much consequence. "'Pon 'onah, now, that's hardly fair, old boy, wobbin' me of my laurels. D G. SMITH; CHATHAM You should nave let me have a hat annoys him, and hearing the dude chawnce." "Hark, man !" "Jack !"

The voice comes from the depths. and thrills them. Aleck is still alive -their mission promises to be a suc-Jack may think he wisely keeps cess—at any rate, they have made a grand start, which means much. They hear a chuckling laugh below. Aleck has lived the last twenty-four hours, Heaven alone knows how, but with alternate hope and fear-a mental fever and ague, as it were-hope sending a warm wave over him, and dread succeeding it with a raw chill. They listen to him climbing the wall-he is in such haste that he overdoes the matter and slips back. "Are you hurt?" calls Jack, in

"No, no," bravely repressing a groan, "only a little bark off my shoulder. I'm with you in a minute. doctor. Have your hand ready-I'm dying to grasp it again-poor devil that I am, not fit to be seen by any woman save Avis-dear Avis. Ah where are you, old Jack, the bravest and best friend a man ever had. That's right-draw me out. Two of you, eh? This is freedom. How good the air feels after months in that vile den. Shake hands, Doctor Jack, my preserver, my brother. Who i this? It seems to me-no, it can't be, and yet-yes, by the powers, it's Cousin Larry. Glad to see you, my boy, but you're the last person I ever expected to have help me out of a Turkish dungeen." "I'm on deck, Aleck," says Larry, smartly. "Yes, and Larry has proved an honour to the family. As I soon expect to be a member of it, I must say I'm proud of him," declares Jack. "Avis is not here?"

"She is on the boat with Madame Sophie, and the sooner we get there the better it will be." Jack has not lost his feeling of uneasiness, even though the affair seems to be going on so smoothly just now. Often the worst storms we have are heralded by peculiar symptoms in the air-a sultry feeling, dead silence, and a sort of unnatural calm-so with Jack-he detects some such signs in E. LEE STREET, - . - PROPRIETOR the horizon of their affairs, and although he cannot tell where the storm will come from, or when it will break, he feels uneasy. "And this is liberty-oh, how sweet to breathe the pure air again-to see the blue vault above. A man never knows how grand a thing liberty may be until he is shut up in darkness for a month or two. Good-bye, old dungeon; sooner than return to your fetid arms I will meet death in any form." Thus apostrophizing his late chamber, Aleck, once so full of life and spirits, now a thin, weak lad, turns to his friends. "We're ready to go. Take my arm, Aleck, and let me help you," says Continued on 4th page.
