 Already Avis has closed the door after him, and secured it, so that Larry finds his bridges burned behind. It is just what he wants. "Makes a fellow desperate, you know," he is accustomed to remark when speaking of the matter later. He turns and leaves the cabin behind The foes whom he seeks to disable are on deck, and there the battle must be fought that will decide the question as to who

A minute later and Larry's head pushes above the deck as he ascends the companion-way, having made his passage Voices sound near him, and he can and the captain of the yacht are talking.

The British lord is in a towering passion because half the crew are ashore, when they should be aboard every night at nine, He even threatens to clap on sail, and, taking advantage of the favorable breeze, desert the sailors on shore. Larry can guess whence his eagerness to quit Valparaiso arises. Lord Rackett fears the vengeance of an outraged husband; he dreads lest at any moment the figure of Doctor Jack may rise up in front of him, calling to account the man

Using his eyes to advantage, Larry counts the figures on the deck as seen by the light of the lanterns and the heavenly bodies. He makes out six still-that is, just two apiece all around, "Well, here goes," mutters the dude, shutting his teeth hard, for Larry has never been a soldier, and is not accustomed to shooting down men on sight. It requires a thought of the rascality

which has been influencing these men to steel his nerves and render him fit for "They deserve death," he mutters, but all the same he aims low down, seeking to give a flesh wound that will place his victim hors de combat, which is all Larry asks. The silence of the night is suddenly broken by the sharp report of a revolver. A jet of flame flashes up from the companion-way, and the fellow at whom the leaden messenger is sent, rolls upon the deck, hugging his leg, and almost delirious from the shock, for pain he certainly does not yet feel.

Of course, at this abrupt outbreak there is the utmost consternation on deck. Men call out and rush this way and that with a vague idea as to the source of the attack. Some have seen the flash of the weapon, and advance to overwhelm the marksman. Larry is ready for business, and calculates that he can cut the number of their mess short when he fires again. as he will do just as soon as he can get the hammer of his fire-arm into position, for the weapon does not appear to work as well as it should. That single shot has served as a signal. Two human forms come tumbling on deck, clambering over the side of the yacht near the stern. As they gain their feet, the fact is established that these new-comers are above the medium in height, and possessed of extraordinary powers of locomotion to judge from the manner in which they advance. This advent brings new cause for astonishment, since it has been so unexpected. The sailors seem to be between two fires, so to speak, and hardly know whether to turn upon those who rush down the deck with the fury of a moun tain avalanche, or face the spot where belched forth the spiteful flash of flame that accompanied the telling shot.

When men are thus undecided, and caught in a trap, they are in a good condition to be easily beaten. It is almost as if they are already on the run. Larry again comes to time-Larry, who has made up his mind to keep snap-CRACKED FEED, ping the hammer of his faithless weapon until the revolving cylinder brings a cartridge within reach that will do its

There is another report, and this time bullet enters the arm of a British sailor man, who, armed with a belaying-pin or marline-spike, has rushed up to demolish the enemy lurking in the companionway. It at least renders him less aggressive, since the arm that is stricken chances to be his right. By this time the two flying figures have cleared the deck, and are upon the party. The stentorian voice of the English lord is heard calling upon his men to rally and repel boarders. He is at least a man, though far from being a credit to his nation. What will it avail? The man who dashes upon them has his iron arm pounds to every man, if you clear the doubly strengthened by the knowledge of his wrongs. He is like a tigress robbed rium of rage. of her whelps, and in her native jungle —a wounded lion at bay. A score of men would not dismay him now-might not overcome this young giant from the great republic of the north. Besides, he is ably seconded by the man from Texas, Kirke Smith, who has tamed horses, chased Apaches and Mexican cattle-thieves, and lived a wild life on the great plains of the Southwest. CHAPTER XIX.

By this time Lord Rackett begins to realize something of the truth, which staggers him. He has taken note of the flying figures before now, but supposed they were some of his own men-that the boat from the Mole had returned with the delayed seamen.

It suddenly flashes upon him that this ing to be attacked, rushes toward the is not the case. Perhaps the rapidity of Doctor Jack's advance has something to His advance is very like the impetuous do with this revelation, for not one of sweep of a blizzard, and some of those the yacht's sailors cares enough for the in his way are apt to believe there is a master of the vessel to thus approach strong comparison between the two. inclined to be desperate, with enemies on about as soon as his companion. both sides. He does not know what to the first man he runs across a push that make of the attack from the companion causes him to lose his balance and fall way-whether it proceeds from one or with a splash into the briny water. more foes. matters, and lying where he is, await the turn of events philosophically. Doctor Jack, ably seconded by Kirke Smith, is now among his enemies. He strikes to avenge his wrongs, and those who come within range of his arms distinguish every word. Lord Rackett suffer the consequences. It is all so sudden that they have no time to prepare, and, taken off their guard, fall an easy prey to the aggressive American, who belabors them right and left. Larry afterward declared that it reminded him of a ball bounding into the midst of the ten pins, and scattering them in every direction. Here a man goes bowling over, sprawling his length upon the deck of the yacht. Just beyond, a second sailor endeavors to grapple with the man who is the cause of all this commotion, but Doctor Jack has no desir o seek close quarters, and stand the fellow off with the skill of a champion. One there is who has cause for complaint, and this is Kirke Smith, who cannot see that Jack means to leave him any share in the little game. As for Larry, he enjoys the sight hugely. It is a rare treat with him to witness the discornfiture of the enemy, after his recent experi-

His stalwart figure bars Jack's triumphant way, and the two come in contact. Under ordinary circumstances the British bull-dog might have been something of a match for the American, but not now. Doctor Jack has been aroused to tiger-like ferocity by the abduction of his wife, and a dozen Lord Racketts could hardly stand before him. The result is never for an instant in doubt. The Englishman has believed himself a master in the art of self-defense, but here he finds his guard broken down by the very impetuosity of Jack's attack, and himself beaten to the deck. "All down!" sings out Larry, from his place of concealment, when the last man has thus given way before Doctor Jack's onset. "Larry!" calls out the doctor, with a great wave of eagerness in his voice. "On deck!" replies the dude, crawling over the top steps and gaining his feet, when he is immediately swooped down upon by a regular hurricane, as Jack clasps his arms around him. Surely the lights of Valparaiso harbor never shone upon a more singular scene than the one that has just taken place. "Avis?" springs from Jack's lips. She is the first thought in his mind. "She is well-and safe behind a locked door," it gives Larry pleasure to say. "Thank Heaven for that!" wells from the heart of the almost distracted hus-Of course, his first thought now is to dive down into the cabin, and claim his own. Indeed, Doctor Jack has even taken a couple of steps in that direction when he comes to an abrupt pause. There is cause. Loud voices are heard over the side of the yacht, and, from this circumstance, he knows one of two sthings have o curred. Either a boat-load of sailors from some man-of-war, attracted by Larry's firing and the sound of conflict, have come to investigate, or else the missing scamen, belonging to the Briton's yacht, have returned at this unfortunate hour. That the latter is the case Jack believes. Here is another question rudely and suddenly brought forward for solution.

These sort of emergencies test a man's caliber, and fortunately Doctor Jack is equal to them, senseless by the blow received, although partially stunned, and these voices reach his ear also. Then comes the hail:-

"Yacht ahoy!" He raises himself from deck with one hand, a fierce joy taking the place of that I'd paralyze him!"-- Pearson's Weekly. despair in his heart. "This way, Danton! We are boarded! To the rescue, British bull-dogs! Ten

The men in the act of clamering over the rail hear, as do their comrades still below in the boat. Probably they have only a vague idea as to the true state of affairs, but the sounds wafted over the water as they drew near the yacht must have warned them that something unusual was taking place. Besides, they have not sailed with milord all this time without discovering his weak points, and no doubt have been concerned in more than one affray on account of him. His exceedingly liberal offer fires their blood. For that amount they would assail even a trio of imps from Tophet. After all the conflict has apparently only begun, and Doctor Jack has another engamement on his hands before he can claim the victory,

This time Kirke is resolved to be in Plympton realizes that his situation is the game, and reaches the scene of action The scene for a minute or so is a pecu pop up here and there in their desperate danger from so many sources around back when one of the Americans rushes to be confronted on all sides, assailed hip Doctor Jack does not desire to use his revolver, save as a last resort. These men are British sailors, not African savages, and although in the service of a man for whom he has only detestation, still they are only doing their duty as hired seamen. When he realizes that there promises to be assure general engagement, Jack calls to his companions, who spring to his side. His mind is upon Avis, and, when it is settled that they had better retreat, he immediately decides upon his course "Let us go below," is what he says. The way to the cabin is close at hand, and from the threatening manner in which the sailors advance it is evident that whatever they expect to accomplish must be done speedily. Larry leads, for his knowledge of the premises is such that he is in a position to take charge of his companions.

They have no trouble in reaching the interior of the cabin. Jack immediately closes and fastens the door, which is still in a serviceable condition. "Keep watch, Kirke," is all he says, but the man from Texas knows what it means, and woe to the party who attempts to enter. Doctor Jack turns upon Larry. "Which door is it?" he asks, huskily. "Wait-she may fire," warns the dude.

His eyes betray the answer to the ques-

"Not when I can call out," returns Jack, as he bound: to the door. "Avis-open!"

Her ears catch the tones. He can hear the glad expression she gives, the cry of intense joy that wells from her heart. Then trembling hands unlock the door. It swings open, and Doctor Jack clasps his own.

Tenderly he folds her in his arms, which have long been her shield, those strong arms against which the tidal wave of hate have beaten in vain. Larry busies himself. He seizes hold of the little brass gun, and drags it into the cabin, where it at once attracts the attention of the doctor and Kirke. "What under the sun have we here?" "Only a trifle, but it may keep the Britons out. I threatened 'em with it "I see you've loaded it heavily. It may be more dangerous at the breech than the muzzle," says Jack, smiling, as his eyes fall upon the amazing variety of missiles that peep forth from the mouth

"No danger of that. I loaded for business. When it goes off this cwaft is doomed, by Jove!" declares Larry, proudly. "Then let us delay the discharge as long as possible, since we have our present abode on board, and hardly care to go down to the bottom of the sea, or Valparaiso harbor." "Hark! what's that!" says Larry,

All listen and can hear a variety of ounds, such as can have but one mean-"Getting underway," declares the Texan, uneasily. "Then it is time we made a move,"
